The Financial Aid Crisis

By Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D.

An educated citizenry is the best thing that can happen to a democracy. Federal cutbacks, however, could cause a "lost generation" of college students

Brother Patrick Ellis, shown here answering a question at a student forum on campus with the college's provost, Brother Emery Mollenhauer, appeared at a press conference with a dozen counterparts in center-city Philadelphia on Feb. 15 to discuss the projected cutbacks. He said that they would have a "devastating effect" on La Salle students, 87 per cent of whom now receive some form of financial aid.

As the dynamics of controversy continue to whirl around the national topic of aid to students, I gladly accede to the editor's invitation to reflect on the issue. The total presentation will also benefit from the careful research of Mrs. Kaye D'Angelo, Director of Financial Aid; Mr. John L. McCloskey, Vice President for Public Affairs, and the editor. We are further indebted to key people in a very well-run state office, the Pennsylvania Higher Education Assistance Agency, and to a national model of inter-sector cooperation, the Pennsylvania Association of Colleges and Universities.

How did we become so dependent on federal and state aid? We actively sought to do so, out of consideration for justice to the students in our colleges and universities, chiefly in the private sector. First came the G.I. Bill, after World War II, which settled the church-state question in the main, aiding the citizen and scaling the aid to the tuition where he or she wanted to go. Though few could have realized it at the time, that two-fold provision was the landmark. The United States launched upon a venture unique in history, inviting all capable Americans to achieve the highest educational level within their intellectual grasp and at the type of college they would choose, whatever the financial implications.

Several subsequent landmarks have imbedded the G.I. decision still further in the national planning process. The cold war, and above all Sputnik, linked higher education and national security in the minds of the Eisenhower administration. By 1958, the National Defense Education Act and (remember its original acronym) the National Defense Student Loan were on the books. By 1965, a year of renewal of the key legislation, civil rights was the theme, and the same programs served to guarantee and promote equal access. Thus, the two-pronged thrust, national security and civil rights, drove the various aid programs ever more firmly into the priorities of the country. Institutions expanded to meet rising enrollments. Young people were encouraged to prepare for college teaching, aided by such private foundations as Danforth and Woodrow Wilson, and by government programs as well.

Growth in more recent years was largely inflationary, in paper dollars. The only major new thrusts have been an attempt to redress an imbalance that had penalized the middle-class citizen, along with efforts to assure just response to the needs of women students.

Philosophically, commitment to an educated citizenry is the best thing that can happen to a democracy. Its converse is the worst, as history shows. Whatever the fluctuations in supply and demand from one profession to another (and these are constant), that truth endures. To be sure, education has not repealed nor revised human nature, so that some of the more romantic hopes for a perfect society haven't been realized and won't be. Memories of the sixties are our worst enemies at the moment, as the activist minority of that decade are seen through a haze, without the sincerity of many, out of context, and out of historical perspective.

Second on the negative list are, of course, those who now abuse aid programs and default on loans. All of us in higher education are just as anxious as the government is, to weed out such abuses; and we are cooperating actively in various ways. (LaSalle and Pennsylvania institutions in general have nothing to be ashamed of in this regard, at least by comparison).

Thus, we have known perfectly well that we were becoming dependent, in a way, on all these federal and state programs. The only alternative was not to grow and thrive. LaSalle's transition from 400 to 4000 full-time students corresponds precisely to the growth in aid. The underlying basis has been a clear national commitment and sense of purpose. We are currently working, chiefly through PACU but on our own as well, to recall that commitment to the minds that matter.

What then, is the aid picture at LaSalle? How "dependent" are we? Eighty-seven percent of our full-time students are aided, no two alike. Each aided student's finances are best described in a pie-graph showing grants, loans, work-study, summer work, parental contributions, and college-funded aid. The grants and loans can be federal, state, and private (e.g. from a union or benefactor). Happily, the earlier neglect of aid to part-time students has largely been rectified by PHEAA and other agencies in recent years; and employer-subsidy is still a significant factor for many. A very great amount of all this is paid back, revolving out to other students year after year with only modest new infusions from government sources.

Even the threat of curtailment has already had negative effects. Families are delaying crucial decisions, and may find their range of choices severely constricted by comparison with that of earlier years. Planning, e.g. of faculty hiring, is more difficult than usual. More seriously, LaSalle's availability to its traditional clientele is seriously compromised. We have given this area and the nation a cadre of outstanding leaders who, to a man (and latterly to a woman) did not think of themselves in such a way prior to meeting this faculty. Someone here opened them up to their potential. The instances of this process are so numerous as to constitute our corporate secular glory; and that distinction is threatened.

If the threat of aid curtailment is harmful, what would the reality be? It would certainly mean shrinkage. Faculty and staff, including some of the liveliest and most current, would surely leave in significant numbers. The presently healthy balance between seasoned, dedicated senior men (and they are all men through historical circumstance) and rising younger persons would be threatened in many departments.

Further, the college would slide into a "survival mode," proximate to intellectual and psychological death. The only infusion of new students would come from places that close, a ghoulis prospect that no one hopes to see. Admissions standards would come under fire, with the threat of that false kindness that brings young people into the wrong environment for their true capacities and then frustrates their hopes. Cash would become, in some minds, the chief vital sign in a candidate. The degree itself could lose standing in the exacting market place of academe.

What is LaSalle doing about all this? Here it is necessary to avoid behaving like Little Jack Horner (whose punch line was "What a good boy am I"). The readers of this magazine have a right to the answer, however, so I press on.

We are, for one thing, adding dorm space. This project, based on a 3% federal loan, answers to demographic needs in the immediate future, and it responds to the free market situation in which students choose to go where they can live. It had originally no link to the aid question, but it is now tied in with that problem. (Should preferences revert to commuting or to off-campus housing, several of our structures are convertible to other uses, so that we have flexibility to respond to at least that imponderable factor.)

In a similar connection, we are devoting much of the proceeds of the Campaign for the 80's to the very extensive renovation of plant. For the most part, we shall be in very good shape to ride out hard times and still attract students. It is a source of continual amazement to me that high school seniors do notice everything about the buildings and grounds and do consider them in choosing a college. Any connection with the daily condition of their own space on campus or at home is bemusing indeed. But, again, legislation hasn't revised human nature . . .

Thus, we are trying to be prepared for whatever happens in Washington and Harrisburg. On the other hand, we very much hope to influence decisions now in process in both capitals. In the state, a 9% increase in PHEAA funding is in the proposed budget. Adoption is the question there, as are revenue levels in the current economy. At the federal level, LaSalle administrators are pitching in whenever opportunity offers. Specifically, visits with senators and congressmen, participation in economic-impact studies, urging letter-writing by our trustees, council of associates, alumni, parents, and students, appearances on talk shows and newscasts, contributions to print media and availability to reporters . . . the list goes on.

Students attend an MBA class at La Salle: Financial aid for the college's graduate students would be virtually eliminated if the projected cuts are approved by Congress. Suggested changes in the Guaranteed Student Loan Program would affect 1,490 La Salle undergraduates next year.

Various trustees and council members, for instance, have written and contacted legislators already. Their addressees have gone beyond Pennsylvania (where many of our best friends are already with us all the way) to other states where key committee members may take more convincing. LaSalle's Public Affairs Office (951-1085) has all the relevant information at hand for such activity.

Students, day and evening, have been indispensable in all these programs, with a new dignified activism that is positive and productive. They have transcended any image of self-centeredness and have conveyed the note of appropriate citizen concern.

Some final thoughts. College students today are not coddled. Virtually all work during summers to help pay their way, and many help at home too. Sixty-five percent of the day students work part-time during the academic year, as do all the evening students. In fact, many students work beyond the point of diminishing returns; and all this with the present aid programs in place.

The USA must not risk a lost generation. Being a citizen, a neighbor, a parent, and parishioner demands all the wisdom a person can acquire, whatever the demands of one's occupation. Let me inject an idea that's borrowed but crucial here. A shift in the aid "mix" to loans rather than grants is being pushed very strongly, benefiting from the appearance of rugged, old-time self-reliance. But such a shift has within it the potential for an unintended side effect, that students will have to choose lucrative professions in order to get out of debt before retirement. A graduate student can easily find himself or herself looking at $50,000 of cumulative indebtedness. Thus, a choice like teaching at any level, social work, or virtually any form of honest public service would be less likely. To be sure, complex working-off formulas are being put forth; and these may offset the negative effect. But there are still, thank heaven, families that traditionally don't borrow ever. From such laudable enclaves the talent would be lost; from many others, the potential for full education would be at least threatened. A nation that is serious about itself cannot have too much education. I urge all readers of this publication to take a public stand on maintenance, intact, of the existing programs at their 1981 levels. As for growth, real and inflationary, we'll get around to that when the crisis is over. Meanwhile, on behalf of the students, LaSalle thanks all who are helping; and we pledge to deserve your support by quality education and prudent management. ■

The Litigator

By Robert S. Lyons, Jr.

Jim Binns loves the action in the courtroom where he has represented some of the nation's biggest corporate, congressional, and competitive names

"Jim Binns is a very unique man. He doesn't come into the courtroom riding a fire engine. A well-prepared lawyer like Mr. Binns doesn't have to rely on flamboyance. He's rather conservative in his approach, logical and reasonable, always sartorially perfect. His trademark is that he's always legally ready. He approaches a case with the same precision as his dress."

—Pennsylvania Supreme Court Justice
James T. McDermott

"I don't believe that I've ever witnessed anyone better prepared to try a case than Mr. Binns. He's quite an impressive advocate. He just keeps coming at you. He possesses a very unique quality of constantly being on the attack, always keeping his opponent off balance. His modus operandi is an extension of his personality and appearance—neat, orderly, and very implacable."

—Philadelphia Common Pleas Court Judge
Jerome A. Zaleski, '59

Maybe that's why James J. Binns, '61, is rapidly establishing himself as one of the nation's top attorneys, specializing in "white-collar criminal litigation." Jim Binns thrives on litigation, the arguing, the give-and-take that many attorneys disdain. "When you're on trial, you're on a high," Binns said recently, sitting in his plush 28th floor office with a spectacular panoramic view across the street from Philadelphia's City Hall. "You need the ability to react to situations under pressure in a manner that doesn't reflect the fact that there is any pressure. You have to know how to take advantage of a situation in a split second. It's not something that you rehearse. It's something that comes as the trial grows and it has to be a spontaneous reaction on your part or you lose it. It's kind of like a sixth sense that you develop."

Binns, who graduated magna-cum-laude in accounting before earning his J.D. at Villanova Law School, has parlayed that "sixth sense" into a brilliant, highly-publicized legal career, especially over the past decade. He has tried hundreds of civil and criminal cases in state and federal courts in Pennsylvania, New York, Delaware, and Florida. He has tried more than 20 first degree murder cases. He has represented such clients as Lloyds of London and U.S. Representative Raymond Lederer in the Abscam case. He served as co-counsel with the former San Francisco Mayor Joseph Alioto in the lawsuit brought by Philadelphia Eagles owner Leonard Tose against three Philadelphia banks. He represented race driver Bobby Unser in his successful appeal against the United States Auto Club, a triumph that resulted in nationwide-acclaim. Binns serves on a number of prestigious Boards and was recently appointed chairman of the Pennsylvania State Athletic Commission by Governor Thornburgh. He is currently representing the Philadelphia Federation of Teachers and its president John P. Murray, '64, a boyhood pal. Speaking of a small world, guess who's representing the other side? Chief negotiator for the Philadelphia School Board is a former high school and college classmate, attorney James R. Melinson. Mayor Bill Green, who also has a personal interest in the teachers' case, was a classmate of Binns at Villanova Law School.

"I love the action," says Binns. "A lot of it is exciting work. The cases that have received media notoriety are interesting, but there are many other cases that I consider of extreme importance that receive no publicity. Many of these cases have provided me with a significant amount of professional excitement. But they were never noticed or publicized. Many of my most worthwhile achievements were settled in terms highly favorable to my clients before they became public knowledge. Many of these cases never reach the light of day, but are a significant part of my practice."

Binns has fond memories of his days at LaSalle. It was during his senior year that he decided to become a lawyer. He took the LSAT exam and won a scholarship to Villanova. "Everything that I took away from LaSalle were good things," he recalls. "I received a very good education and the opportunity to create a life for myself. I credit the Christian Brothers with whatever measure of success that I may have had as a professional person."

After graduation, Binns went to work for a law firm in downtown Philadelphia with intentions of becoming a tax lawyer. He immediately decided not to pursue that field when he discovered an interest in litigation. Two years later he decided to strike out on his own. In 1971, he picked up his first "major" case—representing Lloyds of London in its efforts to recover millions of dollars worth of insurance from the Pennsylvania Railroad. "A gargantuan case," according to Binns, it involved litigation against all the big law firms in Philadelphia and New York and was finally settled six years later on the steps of the Federal Court in Philadelphia at terms "very favorable" to his client.

Not all of Binns' clients have been as fortunate as Lloyds of London. Congressman Lederer resigned from the U.S. House of Representatives last April following his much-publicized Abscam conviction. "That case is a tragedy," says Binns. "In my opinion, Raymond Lederer is a fine human being. I find it easy to identify with the cause of someone who has been put upon by the prosecution and who is an underdog in every sense of the word. The appeal to me lies in taking on the tremendous odds of the prosecution. I enjoy doing that."

Binns raised quite a few eyebrows nationwide a few months ago by taking on the cause of another underdog and getting Bobby Unser reinstated as winner of last year's Indianapolis 500. Two of the three panelists convinced by Binns were officials of the U.S. Auto Club. That's the official body that originally declared Mario Andretti the winner following allegations that Unser disregarded caution-flag speed limits.

"It was a very novel case," recalls Binns. "I've never been exposed at all to auto racing other than the fact that Governor Dick Thornburgh appointed Binns, who went unbeaten as an amateur boxer 20 years ago, chairman of the Pennsylvania State Athletic Commission.

I was friendly with Roger Penske, who happened to own the car Bobby Unser was driving. Cases of a different gender like this lead you into a whole other area of life. You must become for that limited purpose an accomplished race car driver and strategist. That's what makes litigation so interesting. If you don't assume the particular lifestyle for each case and make the study necessary to pick up the jargon, you can't understand what may have gone through that individual's mind at the time of the incident in question."

Perhaps Binns' "most novel" work at present involves his representation of the Philadelphia Federation of Teachers in its labor dispute with the city's Board of Education. Binns assisted Murray in his successful efforts to turn the tables on the 34-member executive committee of the PFT and get elected president in a major upset. He has since represented the teacher's union in its long, bitter contract negotiations and court battles during a time when, Binns says, "there is an all out assault on the part of management against labor."

It was at a court hearing a few months ago during the teachers' strike that Binns put on a typical display of what some of his legal colleagues have characterized as "street smarts, a unique sense of humor, and sharp intellectual ability." Emphasizing why the School District could not back down from a contract it had signed with the PFT, Binns said, "You can't call slipsies." As Common Pleas Judge Harry A. Takiff looked on uncomprehending, Binns explained that the School District can't back off a signed contract any more than a boy playing marbles can't call "slipsies" when he loses his grip.

Although they are currently on opposite sides of the fence in Philadelphia teachers' dispute, Binns says that he has a "very cordial relationship" with Mayor Green. "I have a lot of regard for him," Binns added. "He's a friend of mine."

As an undergraduate at LaSalle, Binns went unbeaten in 20 amateur fights as a welterweight. Fighting out of the Passayunk Gym in South Philadelphia, the 6-1, 147 pounder decided against turning pro to pursue law school. He still retains interest in boxing today as chairman of the Pennsylvania State Athletic Commission, the regulatory body of amateur and professional boxing in the commonwealth. His first act as chairman after being appointed by Governor Thornburgh was to name the college's Brother Anthony Wallace, F.S.C., an excellent athlete himself in his day, as deputy boxing commissioner.

Binns is deeply involved in community affairs. He sits on a number of prestigious Boards in the Philadelphia area including LaSalle's where he maintains particular interest in the academic affairs of the college. It is because of his dedication to LaSalle's intellectual life that he recently donated $25,000 toward endowment of a pair of full scholarships predicated on academic excellence, covering expenses for junior and senior years. "This will enable me to put back into the scholastic community a portion of what I derived from my experience at LaSalle," explained Binns. "It's a method for me to show my support of the Christian Brothers and the ongoing academic life at the college."

A decade ago, Binns served a term as chairman of the board at St. Luke's and Children's (now James C. Guiffre') Medical Center. He is currently chairman of the Organized Crime Task Force of the Citizens Crime Commission of Philadelphia, vice president of Alliance Francaise de Philadelphie, and a director of The Historical Society of Pennsylvania, The Opera Company of Philadelphia, and Philadelphia Charity Ball, Inc. He is a past director of a number of institutions including The Berean Institute, Boy Scouts of America, The Indian Rights Association, Lyric Opera Co. Police Athletic League, and The Prisoners' Family Welfare Fund.

How does Binns have the time for all this activity which includes daily workouts in the gym, and a typical daily schedule extending from 7 A.M. to 10 P.M. "I've never had a problem with that," he says. "I find it very easy to budget my time because I live by my calendars. A great deal of my work can be done over the telephone when I'm not on trial. I just don't let myself get cluttered up with details. Some days are more or less harried than others. I just have to say that I like the action. I couldn't have it any other way or I wouldn't know what to do with myself."

Despite his success and prominence, Binns insists that he has no political ambition. "I would like to be right where I am ten or twenty years from now," he says. "My only ambition is to be able to keep practicing law at the rate that I'm practicing it now, and having as much reward as I'm having now. By reward, I don't mean financial. That doesn't enter into it."

Besides, Binns feels that his best days are still ahead of him. "To consider that I have achieved my greatest legal accomplishment would be unrealistic," he said, "because there's a lot more left in life. I'm still looking forward to my greatest legal achievement." ■

How important is Estate Planning?

The Will: A Roadmap for Family Security

By Terence K. Heaney, '63

Estate planning is more than an orderly arrangement for passing one's affairs to the next generation. Conceptually, it should touch every aspect of an individual's personal and financial life. The primary goal of estate planning should be to assure the transfer of a decedent's property to the beneficiaries of his choice at the smallest possible financial and emotional cost.

One of the cornerstones of good planning is a "Will." Without a will, you leave the decisions regarding the disposition of your property to someone who may not share your dreams and philosophies. In addition, you materially increase the cost associated with administering your estate.

A will should be more than a scrivener's reflection of your general statements. It should be part of an integrated plan that will assure that the majority of the assets pass to your beneficiaries. Although tax planning is a major consideration, the will should also give appropriate consideration to the human factors.

Without a will, an individual's estate will be disposed of under the state laws of intestacy. Intestacy, which is a legal term for death without a valid will, results in the intestate decedent's "estate plan" being created for him by the state in which he was living. Every state has laws which provide the method for distributing the assets owned by such an individual. The actual method varies from state to state and may result in a distribution which is contrary to the decedent's wishes. In addition, it will almost always result in higher estate administration costs.

For the average individual, an essential part of his estate planning would be to provide for his spouse first and then to provide for his children should something happen to both he and his wife. In most states, an individual who dies intestate does not leave the balance of the estate to his wife. She will only be entitled to one-half of the estate and this amount could be less if more than one child survives. Obviously, this does not completely protect the wife since at least one-half of the assets may be going to children who no longer need protection or to other family members who the decedent is not interested in benefiting. The only way to provide the structure that you think is appropriate is with a "Will."

What should a will contain? Primarily, it should contain a reflection of your intentions. Next, these intentions should be reflected in a fashion that will reduce the cost of passing your estate to the minimum.

The techniques available to minimize the cost varies from person to person. Unfortunately, a thorough review of all these techniques is not possible within the confines of this article. However, we shall review some of these techniques in future articles.

In designing the will, consideration should be given to the fact that it does not take effect until death. Therefore, the testator's wishes should be expressed in terms that are sufficiently flexible enough to meet changing situations. In addition, there may be other assets owned by the testator which may pass outside of the will, i.e., life insurance and pension proceeds. In designing the documents, consideration must also be given to these assets to assure that they also pass in accordance with your wishes.

Once the basic design of your estate plan has been completed, the next decision is which individuals will be utilized to effectuate these intentions. The three positions you have to consider are your executor, trustee and a guardian for your children. In deciding who should be appointed to these positions, a review of the duties is in order.

Every will should name an executor. Briefly stated, his responsibilities are to collect the assets of the estate, pay the claims of creditors, file the necessary tax returns for the decedent and the estate, and distribute the balance of the estate to the beneficiaries under the testator's will.

In deciding who should fill this position, consideration should be given to an individual who has at least some degree of financial experience. A family member may be appointed. However, if the individual does not have some financial capability, he should seek outside help because mistakes could cost the estate more than the cost of outside professional assistance.

In deciding who should be named executor, the individual has three major choices: (a) a member of his family, (b) a professional, i.e., accountant or attorney, or (c) a corporate fiduciary. It is possible to name two or more executors. Finally, a will should always provide for the appointment of contingent executors in the event any executor should fail or cease to serve as executor.

A trustee will be needed where minor children are living or where the estate planning includes a trust. In selecting a trustee, the testator must consider additional problems. Unlike an estate, a trust may extend for many years. During this period, the trustee must not only conserve the property but make sure it remains productive as well.

In selecting a trustee, you should select an individual who is knowledgeable and has experience in property and financial matters. The trustee should have record-keeping capabilities and understand how to administer a trust. Whether it should be an individual or a corporate trustee will depend on the individual's personal situation. The advantage of a corporate fiduciary is that the corporation should survive any individual trustee, and this may be important if the trust is in existence for many years. The disadvantage is that the individuals have little say in the administration of the trust.

An alternative might be co-trustees with a corporate fiduciary. This would enable the individual to participate in the administration of the trust and have greater control over the investments. Anytime you utilize a corporate fiduciary the inclusion of a right by the individual trustee to change the corporate fiduciary is also important. This right enables the individual trustee to change the corporate fiduciary if it has done a poor job of managing the trust.

The last of the three fiduciaries named in most wills is the guardian. The standards for selecting a guardian are, of course, quite different from those for selecting an executor or trustee. The latter two are concerned with the property of the decedent. Hence, it is important that they be skilled in property management. However, in selecting a guardian, the most important consideration is that the individual choose a person who will best serve as a substitute parent for minor children who survive the death of both parents. In making this selection, an individual should be guided by what he believes to be most important to the child's development. Typically, a parent will want to name as guardian one whose own value system is similar to his own and his wife's.

Now that the estate has been outlined, the testator's intentions determined and the major appointment decisions made, we must review the basic structure of the will. Wills have followed a traditional structure down through the centuries. There is no requirement to adhere to this structure, but it may most effectively accomplish your desires if you do follow the traditional structure.

One of the elements of the will should be the disposition of personal property. This can be important since some personal property will have sentimental value, and the testator may want to leave such property to a specific individual. Unless the specific bequest is identified, the asset involved will be collected with the other assets and passed under the general provisions of the will.

If real estate is not owned in joint name, then the testator's intentions on who should receive the real property should be specifically stated. If the house is to be given to the wife or children, it should be stated accordingly.

Recent changes to the Internal Revenue Code have introduced some rather complex rules regarding the most beneficial structure of an estate. It may be advantageous to introduce certain trusts to utilize the statutory exemption granted each estate and/or to utilize the marital deduction. Depending on the structure of your estate, the disposition of the remaining portion of your estate can be arranged in many different ways. Your entire remaining estate could be passed tax-free to your spouse under the marital deduction provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. The only problem with this structure is that the assets passing to your wife would then be taxed, at possibly higher rates, in her estate. An alternative would be to set up a trust to utilize the statutory exemption granted your estate and to pass only the remainder to your spouse. The advantage of this structure is that the portion of your estate put in a trust under the statutory exemption can go into the next generation tax-free, while giving your spouse some access to these funds during his or her lifetime.

Another consideration in every will is the naming of, at least, a contingent charitable beneficiary. Naming a charitable beneficiary has several advantages. First, it may satisfy a charitable obligation that you felt during your lifetime. Secondly, the payment of such a charitable bequest out of the estate is deductible and may reduce the taxable estate. Whether it would have been more desirable tax-wise to fulfill this obligation during your lifetime is an individual decision, but the estate can fulfill the obligation for you if you so designate.

In the absence of specific charitable bequests, it is often advisable to name a contingent charitable beneficiary. This means that if none of your heirs are alive to inherit your estate, the charity of your choice would receive it. Absent such a provision, the state of domicile would receive these funds. If you think that such a possibility is remote, it should be pointed out that some states receive many millions of dollars annually because no contingent charitable beneficiary is named in the will or trust.

For a copy of the brochure "Making Your Will: What You Should Know Before You See Your Lawyer," send your name, address, and telephone number to Dr. Fred J. Foley, Jr., Director of Development, La Salle College, Philadelphia, PA 19141.

Another provision that should be considered is a simultaneous death clause. If this clause is not included, there is a statutory presumption that each person is considered to be the survivor with respect to his or her own property. This presumption may upset some of the tax planning benefits associated with a proper allocation of the assets. It could result in under-utilization of the statutory exemptions granted each estate and a corresponding increase in estate taxes.

How the simultaneous death clause is structured will depend on the estate involved and the ownership of those assets during lifetime. However, a discussion on the use of a simultaneous death clause should take place during the planning stages of designing a proper will.

When you have completed your will make sure that you have it properly witnessed after you have executed it. The will should be kept in a safe place, possibly a safe-deposit box. A copy of the executed document should be kept at home with a notation indicating where the original is kept. All prior wills should be marked cancelled or destroyed to avoid the problems of conflicting provisions.

In addition to the above, there are numerous other clauses that a will should contain. Each person should discuss with his or her advisor which standard provisions apply to him or her. We shall explore additional estate and financial planning ideas with you in future articles; and remember, "Where there is no will, it won't be done your way." ■

he Douai - Rheims Bible, 1582-1982

This spring we celebrate the 400th anniversary of the Douai-Rheims Bible, the long-lived translation which has been standard in English-speaking countries. La Salle is commemorating the occasion with an exhibition which attempts to illuminate the work of four great men who renewed the life of that version for many generations.

By Brother Daniel Burke, FSC, Ph.D

his name was Gregory Martin. He is unknown to the average English-speaking Catholic, and he gets only two paragraphs in the new Catholic Encyclopedia. But in his day he was perhaps, the most brilliant scholar produced by Oxford. As a refugee from Elizabeth I's harsh laws against Catholics, he became a priest and a theologian in France—and the first translator of the Bible for English-speaking Catholics. We celebrate the 400th anniversary of his Douai-Rheims Bible this March. Over the last four centuries, his translation was revised and updated several times. But, until quite recently, it held its ground as the standard text for the English-speaking world. Especially for those of us who were brought up on its language and who may now regret, as we listen to texts of the New American Bible at Mass, that the "Magi" of old are now "astrologers" or that the "unjust steward" has become merely a "devious employee"—Gregory Martin and his later editors deserve some attention.

Actually precision of language, if not the niceties of style, was a major consideration for Gregory Martin and his colleagues at the English College at Douai in northern France when William (later Cardinal) Allen, founder and president of the seminary, proposed a new translation in 1578. These men were concerned to achieve as accurate a translation as possible, but not for the uses of personal piety or, for what indeed was to come much later, the liturgy. They wanted simply to protect English Catholics from what they considered the deadly errors of the Protestant versions already in current use—Tyndale, Coverdale, Mathews, Bishops, Geneva. They had in mind also to use the translation to attack the Protestant theologians and controversialists and, hence, they would follow each chapter of the text with scholarly, but often quite trenchant, notes. And no ground was more disputed than the Protestant appeal to the individual reader, rather than to the accumulated wisdom of tradition and church, for the interpretation of God's word. Already, said Martin, there was "such diversity and dissension, and no end of reprehending one another, and translating every man according to his fancy."

With these purposes in mind, Gregory Martin began his work on October 16, 1578—and now at Rheims where the English College had been moved temporarily because of political troubles. A man of "incredible industry," he had written before he was forty a dozen books on Greek and Hebrew, on theology and personal devotion, and he now set himself the arduous task of translating two chapters of scripture a day. His colleagues—other Oxford men now on the faculty of the English College: Richard Bristow, Thomas Worthington, John Reynolds and Allen himself—would review the results daily and help develop the sometimes lengthy notes for the text.

The undertaking of these exiles was also fueled, of course, by the thought of their families and compatriots, so many of them now lost to the Church after years of sectarian struggles and persecution. Their note to Apocalypse 2:5 puts the matter honestly but sadly indeed: Note that the cause why God taketh the truth from certain countries, and removeth their Bishops or Churches into captivity or desolation, is the sin of the Prelates and people. And that is the cause (no doubt) that Christ hath taken away our golden candlestick, that is, our Church in England. God grant us to remember our fall, to do penance and the former works of charity which our first Bishops and Church were notable and renowned for.

There was also the thought of their own graduates, filtering back now to minister to an underground church. Some three hundred went back; more than a hundred lost their lives. Joining the latter for execution at Tyburn was the daring and eloquent Jesuit. Blessed Edmund Campion, Martin's closest friend during their days at Oxford.

In March, 1582, the College's Diary noted that "in this month the finishing touch was put to the English edition of the New Testament." The Old Testament had been finished earlier, but because of a lack of funds it would not appear until 1609, at Douai. The New Testament "translated faithfully into English out of the authentically Latin" was, however, printed immediately at Rheims. Martin himself, exhausted by the work, fell victim to tuberculosis and died in the following October. His sudden death, in his early forties, seems an answer to the moving prayer which concludes the notes to the New Testament:

And now O Lord Christ, most just and merciful, we thy poor creatures that are so afflicted for confession and defence of the holy Catholic and Apostolic truth, contained in this thy sacred book, and in the infallible doctrine of thy dear spouse our mother the Church, we cry also unto thy Majesty with tenderness of our hearts unspeakable, COME LORD JESUS QUICKLY, and judge betwixt us and our adversaries, and in the mean time give patience, comfort, and constancy to all that suffer for thy name, and trust in thee.

O Lord God our only helper and protector, Tarry not long. Amen.

The English version which Martin left, however, was to prove quite sturdy and long-lived. Its language was direct and vigorous: the serving maid who approaches Peter in the courtyard of the High Priest (Mark 14:69) is not a "damsel" but a "wench." If there were odd Latinisms—"But your very hairs of the head are all numbered" (Matthew 10:20)—this was because St. Jerome's Latin version of the fourth century, the Vulgate, was being translated with a passion for accuracy that left no room for apologies. In this stand, Martin anticipated Alexander Pope's judgement in the eighteenth century: "If there be sometimes a darkness, there is often a light in antiquity, which nothing better preserves than a version almost literal." But Martin could be smooth and cadenced in the Queen's English as well, as when he translates St. Paul's exhortations in I Timothy, 6:

Piety with sufficiency is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world: doubtless, neither can we take away anything. But having food, and wherewith to be covered, with these we are content. For they that will be made rich, fall into temptation and the snare of the devil, and many desires unprofitable and hurtful, which drown men into destruction and perdition. For the root of all evils is covetousness: which certain desiring have erred from the faith, and have entangled themselves in many sorrows.

Indeed not only a significant part of Martin's varied diction but also his careful grammatical distinctions were borrowed, though without acknowledgement, by the authors of the King James or Authorized Version of 1611, the version which became the standard of literary elegance for centuries.

Later editions of the Rheims New Testament were few and far between; the second and third were printed at Antwerp in 1600 and 1621, the Fourth in Rouen in 1633. It was, of course, proscribed in England. Ironically enough, what made it more available to Catholics was its publication in 1589, and several times thereafter, by William Fulke, a professor at Cambridge who was appointed to answer, as his title-page puts it, "the manifold cavils, frivolous quarrels, and impudent slanders of Gregory Martin, one of the readers of Popish Divinity in the traitorous Seminary of Rheims." Helpfully enough, Fulke printed the whole Catholic translation in parallel columns with the Bishops' version and then set about to refute its errors.

What is thought of as the fifth edition of Rheims appeared in England in 1738, but with no editor or place of printing indicated. For there were still Penal Laws against Catholics. They could be fined for holding services; under some circumstances, their property could be confiscated; they were excluded from public office and from taking degrees at the universities. Such penalties were lifted only with the Emancipation Act of 1829. The administration of the scattered Church in those years, as in missionary countries, was left to Vicars-Apostolic. And among the most notable of these was the saintly Richard Challoner (1691-1781), who was probably responsible for the anonymous edition of 1738.

hough he was baptized a Protestant, Challoner was brought up in the country home of a Catholic squire where his mother was employed as a housekeeper. As a boy, he was fortunate to get some lessons from John Gother, a priest in the English Mission. John Dryden is reported to have said that Gother was the only man, other than himself, who could write decent English. In any case, when young Richard converted and went off to the English College at Douai, he got advanced standing because of his previous training—and a scholarship. He was to remain at Douai for some twenty-five years, getting a doctorate from the University of Douai, being ordained a priest, becoming vice-president of the college.

RICHARD CHALLONER

In 1730 he returned to the mission in England. While enforcement of the Penal Laws was slackening, a priest could still be imprisoned for life for exercising his ministry. Challoner, therefore, dressed as a secular, used aliases, and moved his place of residence frequently. What he was involved in was clearly a holding operation, an attempt to save the remnants of a Church which would in the next century—with an influx of Irish Catholics and of notable English converts like Newman—have a “second spring.”

In the London district to which he was assigned, Challoner's effort was to strengthen the Catholics simply by his kind and personal contact, his encouraging homilies at their secret Masses, his availability for the sacraments and for counseling. But he also began a ministry of the written word in a varied series of controversial works in which he defended his flock and devotional works, including lives of earlier English saints and martyrs, in which he offered them inspiration. By 1741 he was consecrated a bishop, as coadjutor to the Vicar-Apostolic; his territory included most of southern England and even the American colonies. Despite his duties, Challoner continued his writing and with the aid of Francis Blyth, a Carmelite priest, was able to publish a version of the whole Douai-Rheims in 1749-50. As Stanley Morrison puts it, the new edition presented the Scripture to eighteenth century believers “in words that had the warrant of contemporary understanding.” For by this time, Gregory Martin's rather latinized Elizabethan English was offering some difficulty to the average reader—if, indeed, he or she was able to get a copy of Douai-Rheims. Challoner's revision was so extensive that some, like Cardinal Newman, said that it was really a totally new translation from the Vulgate. Others, like Ronald Knox in our century, thought of it as a “darning and patching” of Martin's version. All agree, though, that Challoner smoothed out most of Martin's more challenging passages. Thus, in the Psalms, Martin's literal rendering gave us the puzzle of “a vineyard was made to my beloved in horn, the son of oil”; in Challoner that becomes “my beloved had a vineyard on a hill in a fruitful place.” The end result was that the Catholic text was brought closer to the King James version, with indeed a number of borrowings that returned the compliment of that Protestant version's borrowings from Gregory Martin.

Challoner's long life was not to end peacefully. In his last years, there was a resurgence of anti-Catholic feeling, and in 1780 a week of destructive turmoil with a mob led by the extremist Lord George Gordon (Dickens recreates the scene in his Barnaby Rudge); the bishop had to flee London to save his life. He was ninety when he died of a stroke; his last word was “Charity,” as he pointed to a few coins in his pockets. The largest charity to his people, however, was the shelf of books he wrote to sustain them. Of those books, none was more important than his revision of Gregory Martin's Bible.

he later history of the Rheims-Challoner Bible involves rather frequent but partial revisions, especially of the New Testament, in Ireland, England, and America. For the present purpose, it may suffice to glance at two nineteenth-century Irish-Americans, of radically different temperaments, who figure in that history—the Philadelphia printer Mathew Carey (1760-1839) and the third bishop of the same city, Francis Kenrick (1796-1863).

Actually, there were no English bibles printed in America until after the Revolution; the mother country reserved those printing rights to herself exclusively. The first English bible was Robert Aitken's King James version of the New Testament printed in Philadelphia by order of Congress in 1777; the first Catholic edition was a reprint of Challoner's 1764 version, produced by the enterprising Mathew Carey in 1790. Carey's list of subscribers included Bishop John Carroll (a major patron, he was down for twenty copies) and Philadelphia notables like Stephen Girard.

Carey himself was, to say the least, a colorful figure. Having been crippled by an accident in his infancy, he had limited formal education but did develop a flair for writing. He was only nineteen when he addressed a pamphlet to his countrymen, pointing out that their wrongs under the British were heavier than those of the Americans and so, for all the more reason, they should follow the fine example of America in revolution. At this juncture, his family thought it best to get him out of the country, for a year in Paris. There he met Benjamin Franklin and began to learn the printing business at Franklin's small press at Passy. After his return to Ireland, there were inevitably more confrontations with authorities and a stint in Dublin's Newgate prison. But, then, not so inevitably, there was an escape in woman's dress, an eventful voyage to America, aid from the Marquis Lafayette in Philadelphia, publishing ventures with several new magazines, a duel in which Mathew was wounded, the courting of Bridget Flahanen, the beginnings of a successful printing and bookselling firm, and the publication of the Challoner Bible—all in eight years. Thereafter, however, Carey became very much the established businessman and civic leader. He fathered nine children, became a member of the American Philosophical Society, the author of several books on economics and an autobiography, a supporter of social causes and philanthropies in his adopted city. He was almost eighty when he died in a carriage accident in 1839.

Besides the first Catholic bible in America (and the second, in 1805, from an Irish revision of Challoner), Carey published several other books by Challoner: The True Principles of a Catholic (1789), Think Well on't (1791), Garden of the Soul (1792), and the Bishop's translation of the Following of Christ (1800), among others. But he also made an ecumenical plea to Protestants to support the publication of his Rheims-Challoner in 1790, published several editions of the King James version and had as one of his salesmen "Parson" Weems, whose moralizing biography of Washington ("I must not tell a lie") was a resounding success. For Carey was always a shrewd businessman. There was his practice, for instance, of obtaining the most popular English novels of the day—and, since there was no copyright, re-publishing them quite cheaply. So extensive was this practice that some believe he inhibited the development of the American novel. By the same token, he may have stimulated the emergence of the American short story, which was soon to become one of the chief glories of our national literature.

MATHEW CAREY

hile Carey's bibles were simply reprints of Challoner and Challoner revised, another Irishman who followed him to America some years later was to undertake a more significant examination and revision of Douai-Rheims in the light of the earlier Latin and Greek texts. This was Francis Patrick Kenrick, third bishop of Philadelphia. Francis left Ireland at the age of eighteen to enter a Roman seminary devoted to missionary work. After several years of brilliant work there in theology and Scripture, he volunteered for a mission in Kentucky. In 1830 he was named a coadjutor bishop in Philadelphia and dealt immediately with turmoil over lay trusteeship of parishes. He founded St. Charles Seminary (and wrote seven volumes of theological texts for the students), established other schools, started construction of the Cathedral, and later as bishop dealt with the anti-Catholic riots of 1844 which left three churches in ruins. In 1851 he was named Archbishop of Baltimore, the Primatial See of the United States.

His interest in revising Rheims-Challoner was a response to the call of the Provincial Council of Baltimore (1829) for an updated and annotated edition suitable for Americans. In spite of his heavy administrative duties—they included nineteen visitations by stagecoach and horseback to cover each time a diocese which was then the size of England, Scotland, and Wales—he persisted in his translation project, checking the ancient texts and a wide variety of commentators. The tone of his notes is open, if not conciliatory—"I have availed myself of the researches of modern writers, unhappily estranged from Catholic communion"; he is modest—"I cannot hope that a work which demands so much erudition and such exercise of judgement, is in every respect faultless"; but he has a firm faith in the Church's role in interpreting the sense of Scripture, which "otherwise becomes a labyrinth from which there is no issue."

The bishop's first publication (1849) was the Four Gospels; over the next eleven years, he followed it with five other volumes. The work was well received by American and English authorities, especially Cardinal Wiseman and Newman. But strangely enough, it was not adopted by the American bishops as the standard text. In part, perhaps, this was because Newman had been asked by the English Bishops to do a new translation; hopes were high for it, but it never materialized. Also, several American bishops were less than enthusiastic about Kenrick's work—including his own brother Peter, the Archbishop of St. Louis. In the end, Kenrick was to say simply "I present my work as a literary essay, rather than as a substitute for the Douay translation." For he was indeed a holy man; in fact authorities in Philadelphia considered promoting his cause for canonization, before supporting his successor, John Neumann.

Our emphasis here has been on the history of the Rheims translation into the nineteenth century. There were, of course, important further developments until the middle of the twentieth century. And two basic directions marked this last stage. First, the Vulgate gradually lost favor as the authoritative standard among the early texts, unofficially in translations like those of the Rev. Francis Spencer at the turn of the century, officially in the later work of the Confraternity committee. Second, the modernization of the English became increasingly thorough. What especially undercut any effort of New Testament translators to achieve a solemn or refined level of English was the contention of scholars like Goodspeed that the Greek of the gospels and epistles wasn't classical Greek at all but an everyday colloquial Greek: it was "you" not "thou," "did" not "didst." Nevertheless, in England Father Knox said that he attempted "a sort of timeless English that would reproduce the idiom of our own day without its neologisms, and perhaps have something of an old-fashioned flavor about it." The American Confraternity edition (and its final form in 1970, the New American Bible) was the work of a committee, and perhaps simply for that reason has less consistency in the level of modern American it attempted. It can, in fact, be remarkably awkward and jarring at times.

But the four men we have discussed here—Martin, Challoner, Carey, Kenrick—created, revised, and sustained an English translation which, despite its faults, had a remarkably long and fruitful life. They were strong characters: intelligent, hardworking, patient, persistent. The three translator-editors especially had none of the resources or the support of the large committees that managed some of the earlier and most of the later editions of the English bible. They pursued their work practically alone because they saw a pressing need among their people; they persisted despite opposition and persecution. And their efforts over the centuries kept viable for successive generations a vigorous translation of the Bible which admittedly did not have the elegance of some others, the minute accuracy of still others over those years, but which effectively served its basic purpose.

The last chapter in the history of the Douai-Rheims translation and its later revisions has come in our own times. It has now been replaced officially by the Knox translation and the New American Bible, unofficially by the Jerusalem Bible and a number of common and ecumenical versions. What is certain, however, is that the work of Gregory Martin and his successors served well the needs of English-speaking Catholics in harder times. They are men who, this year especially, deserve our remembrance and our gratitude.

College To Introduce Graduate Programs in Education and Spanish Bilingual Studies

LaSalle College will introduce a pair of innovative graduate programs this September in Education and Bilingual/Bicultural Studies (Spanish), it was announced by Brother Emery C. Mollenhauer, F.S.C., Ph.D., the college's provost.

The program leading to a master's degree in education is designed for professionals at all levels—elementary, secondary, and special education. It will focus on all aspects of human growth and development and will require a minimum of 30 credit hours over a three year period. It will be offered on a part-time basis in late afternoons, evenings, and the summer.

"We believe that it is time for another significant upgrading of teacher education," said Dr. Gary Clabaugh, the director of LaSalle's program. "The knowledge we have gained in the last several decades regarding how individuals learn and develop or fail to do so, promises to make this next step a major one. Hopefully, our new program will be instrumental in this process."

The heart of the new program is an 18 hour "Core" curriculum required of all candidates, which is devoted to the systematic study of every aspect of the growth and development process. The "core" will include courses in the application of cognitive, language, and perceptual motor development theory; social-emotional, moral, and sexual development theory; the educational relevance of developmental phenomena as they relate to the younger and older child; educational implications of the developing individual in societal context; tests and measurements for the appraisal of human development and performance, and the modern teacher and technological advances.

"The purpose of this core," explained Dr. Clabaugh, "is to allow a teacher faced with a problem to diagnose the difficulty in terms of a truly professional level of knowledge and then to devise or adopt appropriate procedures for solving the problem."

The master's degree candidates will then select from such "Enhance and Enrich" seminars as the management of human behaviors in educational setting, exceptionalities and individual differences, cultural differences, and the developmental implications of religious education.

The remaining three credits in "Summative Experience" will be individually tailored to each candidate's interests and needs.

Clabaugh explained that the "elective" portion of the program emphasizes the development of skills based upon the knowledge acquired in the "core."

"Here the students are afforded the opportunity to take their knowledge into the field of their profession and then to return to a series of seminars which are designed to develop the knowledge-skills relationship," explained Clabaugh.

The graduate program in Bilingual/Bicultural studies (Spanish) is designed for educators and other urban professionals.

Requiring a minimum of 30 credit hours, it will be offered part-time in the late afternoon and on Saturdays.

According to Dr. Leonard Brownstein, associate professor of Spanish and director, the new program will develop language and cultural competencies for those who work in bilingual settings.

"These competencies will enable the urban professional to function more effectively in the Hispanic community," Brownstein said.

The program is interdisciplinary in nature, combining instruction in Spanish, history, and education. In addition to the utilization of several full-time faculty members of LaSalle, some courses will be taught by faculty from Philadelphia Public and Archdiocesan School systems and by urban professionals actively involved in the Hispanic Community.

This new M.A. program will contain three tracks. Track one is designed for teachers, school counselors, clinical psychologists, principals and other administrators. The second track is specifically designed for police personnel, nurses, social workers, and other professionals working in Hispanic communities. The third track provides intensive training in Spanish for non-degree candidates who want to improve their competency in urban Spanish and bicultural studies.

La Salle's chapter of the American Chemical Society recently was selected for special commendation as one of the nation's outstanding student chapters. Only 30 other institutions of a total of 761 were commended for excellence. Shalhoub, assistant professor of chemistry.

The first two tracks require a minimum of fifteen hours on intensive training in Spanish and fifteen hours of course work in cross-cultural understandings.

Students also participate in a five week Summer Immersion Program dealing with language and culture and have field experiences in schools, hospitals, police precincts or social service organizations in Hispanic communities.

The program, which is competency based, requires the satisfactory completion of comprehensive written and oral proficiency examinations in Spanish and in bicultural concepts.

Brownstein said that his extensive experience teaching Spanish in the College's Evening Division to various groups of urban professionals underscored the need for advanced training in bilingual/bicultural studies in the Philadelphia area. "Although there are more than 200,000 Hispanics living in the Philadelphia area," explained Brownstein, "There are no more than 40 Hispanics in the entire Philadelphia Police Department. Many emergencies arise in which law enforcement officer with Spanish-speaking skills are desperately needed and are not to be found."

It is also possible that several of the courses will be offered on-site at selected area hospitals and other institutions.

La Salle received three technical grants from the Pennsylvania Department of Education and another grant from the Dolfinger-McMahon Foundation to develop a feasibility study for graduate programs in bilingual/bicultural studies. The Tinker Foundation recently awarded La Salle a $35,000 grant to cover some of the start-up costs. In addition, the Samuel Fels Foundation contributed $10,000 for the purchase of audio-visual materials and library acquisitions.

Marketing Course, Trip Scheduled In Australia

LaSalle will offer a trip to Australia with an optional three-credit course, "Current Problems in International Marketing," from August 17 until September 9, 1982.

The course will include a study of the social, cultural, political, institutional, behavioral, economic, and competitive conditions in the area of international marketing. Participants will visit Sydney, Canberra, and Melbourne with optional excursions to the Outback.

People are welcome to join the trip without taking the marketing course.

For further information call the instructor and tour director, L. Thomas Reifsteck, chairperson of the college's Marketing Department, at 951-1075, or write to the Career Planning and Placement Bureau, La Salle College, Philadelphia, PA 19141.

Swimmers Win Third ECC Title; Finish 2nd in East

To absolutely no ones surprise, the La Salle College swimmers captured their third straight East Coast Conference championship at the University of Delaware on the last weekend of February. The Explorers won the meet with a total of 493 points, 60 points ahead of second place Drexel.

The highlight of the entire season, however, came a week later when La Salle finished second in the Eastern Seaboard Meet at Army. Only Paul Jarvis (50-yard freestyle), Carl Maler (100-yard freestyle) and the 400-yard freestyle relay team of Jarvis, Maler, Grier Schaffer and Bill Warrender captured first places, but the team had enough overall depth to make its strongest showing ever at the Easterns.

The Explorers won eight of 18 events in the ECC meet which Coach Paul Katz admits his team was preoccupied. "We were looking forward to the Eastern Seaboards," said Katz after his team matter-of-factly walked to the title. "When you do that you're not going to get the same results as you would have."

Nonetheless, the results were enough to make the swimmers the first La Salle team ever to win three consecutive ECC championships.

Double-winners in the ECCs for La Salle were freshman Jarvis, who captured the 50-yard freestyle and the 200-yard freestyle and senior Maler who marched to the victory stand after the 200-yard individual medley and the 100-yard freestyle. Jarvis and Maler also keyed La Salle's 800-yard freestyle relay team that raced home in an East Coast Conference record of 6:52.1. Seniors Rich McElwee and Warrender also anchored that winning relay team.

Other winners for the Explorers were freshman Craig Cummings, who set a new ECC record by clocking a 4:06.06 in the 400-yard individual medley, Brian Kelca who won the 100-yard butterfly and Dan Kelly who defended his ECC title on the 3-meter board.

The key to the Explorers strong finish in the prestigious Eastern Seaboard meet, according to Katz, was getting into scoring position. "Our success at the meet was our consistency," added Katz. "We talked a lot about swimming well in the morning so we would be in position to score."

The Explorers were in second place at the end of the first day, but had not yet reached the winner's circle in any event. That came the second day in the 50-yard freestyle, an event in which the coach

Look Homeward Angels

It's been six years since the La Salle Art Gallery opened its doors as a cultural resource for students, alumni, and the community. Since its opening many guest books have been filled, numerous campus classes held there (35 classes from four disciplines last semester alone), and several organizations, both on campus and off, have hosted events in the Gallery, two notable ones being the English and Medical Alumni.

In its remarkable development, individual art collectors have been a major source of support. Now for the first time, however, we are seeking the support of our general public. A Friends of the Gallery group is being formed and dubbed ART ANGELS. Membership in the ART ANGELS is a way of expressing appreciation and interest—and a way of being informed. Our heavenly multitude will be assembling for a substantial but unpretentious banquet of

- exhibits, concerts, and other happenings for which you'll get announcements
- exhibition catalogues
- authentication by the staff of your own prints, drawings, and paintings (not appraisals)
- opportunities to see and study materials from the collections which are not on exhibit

- invitation to the annual gala of ART ANGELS

We are asking you to become an ART ANGEL for the LaSalle Gallery—to take under your wing a museum which represents the only permanent display of paintings, drawings, and sculpture of the Western tradition offered by a college museum in the area. Come to the lower level of Olney Hall and see the collection which documents the major styles and themes of Western Art from the Middle Ages through the 20th century. Five period rooms await you as well as a changing exhibition in the Print and Drawing Room.

The Annual ranks:

hoped he could get two swimmers in the top eight. Jarvis and Warrender did much better than that, finishing one-two in the event. "Finishing one-two in an event like the 50 made everybody realize that LaSalle was a power in the meet," said Katz.

As the meet headed into the third and final day, Harvard was clearly out in front and the battle was on for second place. Maler became the second LaSalle swimmer to capture a first place in the meet's thirteenth event, the 100-yard freestyle, but LaSalle was still in a dogfight with Princeton for second place overall.

The battle between the two schools lasted into the meet's final event, the 400-yard freestyle relay, an event which Princeton had taken in a dual meet between LaSalle and the Ivy League power earlier in the season. To finish second, LaSalle would have to win this rematch.

Jarvis started on the blocks for LaSalle and virtually was in a dead-heat with Princeton's Dan Sykes after the first leg. Schaifer kept LaSalle well in reach of Princeton on the second leg and Bill Warrender put the team ahead after the third. Maler made that lead stand-up and LaSalle had its highest placing ever at the Easterns.

As a little icing on the cake, the 400-yard freestyle relay team qualified for the NCAA's on that performance with Coach Katz having the honor of presenting the awards to his quartet.

In retrospect, it was truly a great performance by the LaSalle College swim team. Every school record except two were broken at the Easterns as the Explorers improved from an eleventh place finish just one year ago to their runnerup slot. "We beat every team we dreamed we could have beaten," said Katz.

With only three first-place finishes, depth ultimately carried the team. "Virtually every one on the team performed career bests," says the coach. "That's what it took—every swimmer doing his best."

College Raises Tuition, Room, Board For '82-83

La Salle College will increase its full-time tuition by $450 to $4,150 for liberal arts and business administration students in 1982-83, it was announced by Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D.

Tuition for full-time science students will cost an additional $150. Tuition for the college's Evening Division and Summer Sessions, effective in the summer of 1982, will be increased by $10 to $95 per credit hour. Tuition per credit hour for the college's Graduate Religion program will go up $15 to $120; for other Graduate programs, $20 to $170.

Depending on which of three "meal plans" a student chooses, room and board charges will range from $2,500 to $3,160 annually, reflecting increases ranging from $270 to $330.

In a letter to students and parents, Brother Ellis said that rising enrollments in recent years had enabled the college to keep tuition increases below the inflation rate. A level or slightly-declining enrollment, however, will make 1981-82 and '82-83 very close to the line financially, especially with the costs of instruction equipment, energy, and security continuing their upward spiral.

"While our increases are similar to others around town, and our charges still in the middle of the private sector," the president added, "we are doing what we can to offset the impact on students and parents. Appropriate staff and trustees are fully active in organized efforts to maintain financial aid at federal and state levels. Energetic and persistent campaigns to enhance private-sector student aid are going on daily."

Peter A. Zambelli (right), director of public relations, Atlantic Richfield Co., recently presented a check for $100,000 from the ARCO Foundation to Brother President Patrick Ellis in support of the college's Campaign for the 80's.

La Salle's Social Work Program under the direction of Sybil Montgomery (right), has received its official accreditation from the Council of Social Work Education. La Salle thus becomes the first and only Catholic college in the five county Philadelphia area to receive such certification for a Social Work Program. Checking the curriculum are Dr. Barbara Levy Simon (left), coordinator of field instruction; Rita McGlone (second from left), head of the Student Social Work Association, and Janet Bradley, vice chairman of the student group.

a musical fable

JULY 7 - AUGUST 1

Let us entertain you with the legendary story of Mama Rose, whose ambitious scheming drove her two unwilling daughters down the rugged road of show biz success. The result? Vaudeville's sweetheart, "Baby Jane" Havoc, and the immortal queen of burlesque—Gypsy Rose Lee.

From Tin Pan Alley to Minsky Burlesque, "Gypsy" takes a kaleidoscopic tour of the glittering panorama of vaudeville in the 20's and 30's.

Music Theatre's 20th Anniversary

A Night To Remember For a Pulitzer Prize Winner and a Beloved Founder

Brother President Patrick Ellis dedicates the Dan Rodden Theatre with the Rev. Gilbert V. Hartke (center) and Claude F. Koch, '40.

La Salle Music theater began its 20th anniversary celebration on July 6, with special ceremonies prior to its opening night performance of GYPSY when Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Charles H. Fuller, Jr., was awarded an honorary degree and the College Union Theatre was renamed in honor of Music Theatre Founder Dan Rodden, '41.

Fuller, who attended La Salle College's Evening Division, received an honorary doctor of fine arts degree from La Salle College President Brother Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D. He was awarded the 1982 Pulitzer Prize for drama for his critically-acclaimed Off-Broadway production, "A Soldier's Play."

Rodden, a long-time professor of English at La Salle who died in 1978, was widely-known and respected in theatrical circles as an actor, director, and producer. Founded in 1962, La Salle's Music Theatre remains today the nation's only college-sponsored professional summer music theatre.

Brother Emery C. Mollenhauer, F.S.C., Ph.D., the college's provost, sponsored Fuller. "We admired Charles as a person, not a playwright, when he was a student here," said Brother Mollenhauer as he presented Fuller for his degree, "because he so typified what the Evening Division stands for. He came to La Salle after his army service for a second chance at an education. He was older, wiser, married, and a father anxious to make a better life for his family. In other words, he was a fairly representative Evening Division student—except for one thing. He was beginning to write plays.

"I would like to say they were good plays, but honesty compels me to report that they have been recently described by their creator at 'best forgotten.' An artist learns from experimenting, however, and Charles kept writing while working as a city housing inspector in the day and attending classes at night.

"A writer must be an observer and a reader, and Charles was getting plenty of opportunity to study people in the daytime and literature at night. To put it another way, he was learning his subject by day and his method by night. He recently acknowledged as much in a gracious note to one of his professors in which he said, 'I hope everyone in the English department is well and still pushing story and craft. I know that when I left La Salle I was carrying both of them—and when I arrived I was empty-handed.'

"Charles saw his early efforts at story and craft bear fruit in a production of 'The Perfect Party' at McCarter Theater in Princeton and later in an Off-Broadway theatre. Although he himself now describes it as 'one of the world's worst interracial plays,' it was good enough to win critical praise and launch his career as a promising playwright. He and the Negro Ensemble Company joined forces in 1974 and worked and matured together until 'A Soldier's Play' became that rare and wondrous event—the Hit Play. It was the 15th anniversary of the Negro Ensemble and the twenty first play Charles Fuller had written.

"Far from being an overnight success, then, he has earned the rewards of the past fourteen years as a struggling playwright. He has shown he has what it takes to be a writer—the discipline to keep writing. We at La Salle can take pride in having played a small part in the making of an artist.

"Charles has honored us by his association with La Salle and we now take the opportunity this evening to pay tribute to him as a man of La Salle, a man of Philadelphia, and a man of the theater.

"I am especially thrilled tonight to have the opportunity of honoring a former La Salle student who has brought distinction to this College by achieving the highest literary recognition," said Brother President Ellis.

"In honoring Charles Fuller the playwright, La Salle is but one voice in a chorus of praise. But in honoring Charles Fuller the man, who grew up in the Catholic schools of Philadelphia, we have reasons for feeling a special pride and kinship. Not only have you practiced the objectives of this college in providing the 'informed service and progressive leadership' we envision in our college catalog, but you have also grown in maturity in all human relationships. You have honored those of us who were your teachers because you have honored your father and mother, and been a caring husband and father.

"My soul has grown deep like rivers,' wrote the poet Langston Hughes, and you have shown this growth in your life as well as in your development as a playwright.

"It gives me the greatest pleasure to complete the journey you began in the Evening Division many years ago

ON THE OCCASION OF

To remember Dan Rodden honorably is to see him warts and all. He deserved no less of us.

Inscribed over the interior of the North Door of St. Paul's Cathedral in London is the tribute to Sir Christopher Wren: Si monumentum requiris, circumspice ("If you would see the man's monument, look around"). Dan would not object at all to that allusion at this moment—the comparison it implies. "Rodden and Wren"—and Dan with top billing. He never suffered the inhibitions of modesty. I can hear him say: "Well, it isn't exactly inappropriate, Claude."

Some of us loved him, warts and all. But perhaps we did not realize it until he had died, taking with him that capacious and often cruel wit that not a single one who knew him for any length of time failed to delight in. And to suffer from—for Dan required admirers, not friends. One thinks of Evelyn Waugh.

I hope he is mocking me at this moment. I want to hear him pontificate in his thunderingly superior manner: "I told

THE DEDICATION OF THE DAN RODDEN THEATRE

(Remarks by Claude F. Koch, Professor, English and Communication Arts)

Clockwise from top left: Dan Rodden backstage after a 1970 Music Theatre performance of Bitter Sweet with Peggy Wood, with radio-television personalities Joe McCauley and Ed McMahon during a 1967 testimonial dinner in his honor; a 1972 performance of the American premiere of Ambassador; scenes from first two Music Theatre productions, Carousel and Annie Get Your Gun

you that." Because I find in the precision of the Oxford English Dictionary the term that identifies him. It is genius—not simply in the sense of a titular spirit of this place (he is indeed that), but as one having instinctive and extraordinary capacity for imaginative creation. Yet I continue the quarrel that any of us who worked side by side with Dan on the La Salle Faculty had inevitably going with him about one thing or another. My quarrel is with his vision of himself. Dan had no doubt he was a genius, but he did not agree that his capacity—his instinctive and extraordinary capacity—for imaginative creation lay simply and only in what he made in and of others. He who intuited so surely the possibilities in others had little knowledge of himself, and this disturbed his spirit as he grew older. He created artists; his genius was a reflected light. His was a teacher's genius. But so pervasive was his ego that he would not settle for a gift as rare as that: how by annoying and bullying and outraging the many young people who came to him and whose talent for various aspects of the theatrical art he sensed unerringly, he drove them to surpass themselves, to do unexpected and beautiful things with and on this stage.

They know, all those old Music Theatre people—most of them scattered in their craft far beyond this theatre now—what voice awakened them, often by shouting down their own. And a good thing.

This is a way to remember him, warts and all. But perhaps the best way (painful as it is) is of Dan as a spectral figure annoying us all by padding the corridors of Olney Hall in the last years of his terrible illness. Now that he no longer annoys us, we see his courage clear. He could not be battered into humility; he could not quit. Now, in retrospect, we recognize the flowering in his life of that building persistence that made him demand and get from young people more than one ever dared hoped possible.

by conferring upon you a La Salle College Degree, Doctor of Fine Arts, Honoris Causa."

The Dedication of the "Dan Rodden Theatre" included tributes by the Rev. Gilbert V. Hartke, O.P., professor emeritus of The Catholic University of America who was one of Rodden's professors, and Claude F. Koch, '40, professor of English and Communication Arts at La Salle, who was a long-time colleague of Rodden.

Hartke read excerpts from a letter written by Walter Kerr, drama critic of the New York Times and a former teacher of Rodden who praised Dan as "a fine director, an imaginative, really creative producer, and, on top of that, a good actor."

Joe Grady, '40, professor of communications at St. Charles Seminary and co-host of the revitalized "950 Club" on Philadelphia's WPEN radio, sent a tape for the occasion on which he called Rodden, "the prolific theatrical man . . . he had tremendous intuition, great foresight and stamina." TV personality Ed McMahon, a classmate of Rodden's at The Catholic University, praised Rodden via tape as "a visionary (who) didn't understand the phrase, 'It can't be done,' or 'It won't be done,' or 'no.' He just went on about his business and got it done."

After graduating from La Salle, Rodden earned a master of fine arts degree in speech and drama at The Catholic University. As an Army officer during World War II, he was assigned to the staff of Capt. Maurice Evans where he directed over 20 plays and eventually became commanding officer of the largest entertainment section in the South Pacific. A senior member of Actors Equity, Mr. Rodden appeared professionally with and/or directed such stars as Carol Channing, the late Myron McCormick, Brian Donlevy, John Dall, Frances Sternhagen, and William Prince.

But it was La Salle's Music Theatre which gave Rodden his greatest satisfaction when it opened in 1962 with a performance of "Carousel." Rodden had personally supervised every facet of design and construction of La Salle's modern 382 seat College Union Theatre. He produced some 27 shows over the next 12 summers including the American premier of "Ambassador" in 1972 which later enjoyed a short run on Broadway.

Thriving on youthful exuberance, colorful sets and costumes, and highly-professional choreography and technical competence rather than on name performers, La Salle's Music Theatre became known for its favorable critical acclaim under Rodden's guiding spirit. As critic Ernest Schier once said in the Philadelphia Bulletin, "La Salle's Music Theatre has earned a reputation for crisp professionalism that may well be envied by the larger, better-known summer theatres."

Although the rave reviews, capacity audiences, and professional success enjoyed by Music Theatre performers were a source of tremendous satisfaction to Rodden, the one thing he always treasured most was the educational opportunity afforded by this unique summer venture.

"I don't know of any other place where kids can get training in musical comedy," Rodden explained when he founded the Music Theatre. Later, reflecting on the success of Music Theatre in developing promising talent, he said, "From the start I always wanted to do good shows and do them well. I had the feeling that you could take a bunch of kids and achieve a style. I didn't want them to be 'professional,' I just wanted them to be good. With their youth and vitality and with plenty of rehearsals, I knew that they'd succeed."

A number of prominent personalities in the entertainment industry once participated in La Salle's Music Theatre. They include dancer Judith Jamison, New York WCBS-TV drama critic Dennis Cunningham, '59, "Lawrence Welk Show" soloist Mary Lou (Cookie) Metzger, and actor Pat Cronin.

Brother Gene Graham, F.S.C., '47, producer of La Salle Music Theatre since 1978, is directing both of this year's productions, GYPSY, and CAN'T HELP SINGING (An Evening of Jerome Kern), which is running until August 29.

DEVELOPMENT REPORT 1981-82

Dear Friend of La Salle College:

For the fourth consecutive year, La Salle's many benefactors contributed a record level of support to the College as total gifts and grants reached the $3,394,745 mark for the first time in the institution's history. Foundation and Corporate support for La Salle increased dramatically, as did federal grants awarded to the institution. Alumni contributions continued to grow at a steady pace, support from the Christian Brothers' Communities reached a new plateau, and an ever increasing number of faculty and staff members and parents made sacrificial commitments to the College. As a result of all of these efforts, La Salle's CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80's: DECADE OF REDEDICATION AND RENEWAL is nearing the $10.6 million mark and has begun to generate the resources which the College critically needs for the years ahead. Through the faith which so many persons and organizations have shown in La Salle, we are closer to our goal of $15 million, and are increasingly optimistic that we will reach our objective by June 30, 1983.

The major highlights of the 1981-82 fund-raising year were as follows:

- Foundation and Corporate support topped the $1 million mark for the first time in La Salle's history. The $1,106,813 included major grants from the Pew Memorial Trust, the Kresge Foundation, the W.K. Kellogg Foundation, the Atlantic Richfield Foundation, the William Penn Foundation, and the W.W. Smith Charitable Trust, as well as substantial support from a wide variety of other foundations and corporations which are listed elsewhere in this report.
- Despite cutbacks in many programs funded from Washington, federal grants to the College attained a record setting level of $619,276 in 1981-82. Foremost among the new federal grants awarded to La Salle were $200,000 from the U.S. Department of Education's Strengthening Developing Institutions Program, $140,000 from the National Endowment for the Humanities Challenge Grant Program, and two grants ($50,000 and $29,920) awarded by the Department of Labor to the Urban Studies Center. For 1982-83, we have already received official notification that the Department of Labor has renewed and expanded its Summer Youth Employment Program grant, the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs has awarded $39,006 to support the new M.A. Program in Bilingual/Bicultural Studies for Educators and Other Urban Professionals, and the Fund for the Improvement of Post Secondary Education has awarded $46,133 to assist the new M.A. Program in Education.

- Alumni support for the Campaign also reached a new level as 2,676 donors contributed $310,727, a 10% increase over 1980-81's record setting amount. Corporate matching gifts also attained a new high of $40,026. Special recognition and thanks are due to Jack French, Terry Heaney, the Annual Fund Executive Committee, the volunteer solicitors and the student, parent and alumni phonathon volunteers whose unceasing activity on our behalf made this successful effort possible.
- The several Christian Brothers' Communities at La Salle once again funded the Christian Brothers' Scholarship Program, contributing $259,092 for this purpose. As in past years, these scholarships directly aided academic leaders from many high schools, and made college possible for many outstanding students who might otherwise not have been able to attend.
- Faculty and staff contributions to the Campaign continued at sacrificial levels, as did parent donations. During 1981-82, 178 faculty/staff members contributed $33,282, and 125 parents donated a total of $9,425. Once again, these noteworthy achievements are due, in large measure, to the tireless work of the College Committee, chaired by Dr. Charles A. J. Halpin, Jr. and Dr. Barbara C. Millard, and the Parents Committee, chaired by Gerald P. Nugent, Jr.
- Finally, the major source of government support was again the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania's Institutional Assistance Grants Program, and La Salle continued to play an active role in presenting the private sector's case to the General Assembly. In addition, La Salle's Act 101 grant, which supports the Academic Discovery Program, grew to $55,000 and enabled the College to offer a broad range of educational and counseling services to ADP students. For 1982-83, the Act 101 grant has been increased to $59,000.

With funds generated by the CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80's, we have already begun to accomplish several of our most essential objectives for the DECADE OF REDEDICATION AND RENEWAL:

- Completion of an Annex to the College Union Building and renovation of the original facility.
- Renovation of the Holroyd Science Center.
- Expansion of the technical assistance programs offered by the Urban Studies Center for neighborhood and community organizations in Germantown, Logan, Olney and West Oak Lane.

- Increased financial aid for students from middle income families.
- Implementation of the Social Service Agency Management Education Development Program.
- Creation of a special endowment program to support faculty development projects in the Humanities.
- Acquisition of equipment for the Communication Arts Program, including a complete State-of-the-Art TV Production Studio.
- Development of two new graduate programs, the M.A. Program in Bilingual/Bicultural Studies (Spanish) for Educators and Other Urban Professionals, and the M.A. Program in Education.
- Expansion of storage and display space in the art Gallery and conservation of a number of valuable paintings.
- Establishment of a new scholarship program for mature second-career women.
- Construction (completion date: August, 1983) of a new dormitory and dining hall for resident students.
- Implementation of an Executive-In-Residence Program in the School of Business Administration.

Despite our successes and accomplishments, we still have a long way to go to reach our goal of $15 million, and, in the year ahead, we will be appealing to all of our friends and benefactors to extend themselves as much as possible in support of the CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80's. Among those objectives which we still need to attain, the following are of the utmost importance to the College:

- A thorough renovation of College Hall, the 52 year old landmark structure at 20th and Olney.
- Implementation of an integrated data base system for College management through expansion of the Computer Center.
- Additional financial aid, particularly for students from middle income families, independent students, graduate students, and part-time students.
- Completion of the matching portion of the NEH Challenge Grant Program.
- Expanded faculty and administrative office space.
- A new home for the now-divided and crowded functions of the David Leo Lawrence Library.
- Expanded and improved outdoor recreational facilities, especially tennis courts, fields, and an adequate track.

To achieve these goals, we will be redoubling our efforts to increase Alumni, Corporate and Foundation support for La Salle, and we are confident that your loyalty and support will insure that the Campaign succeeds. In the meantime, all of us who are involved in the CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80's deeply appreciate the continuing commitment and assistance of all of those persons—Trustees, Alumni, Administrators, Faculty Members, Parents, Students—whose efforts have contributed so significantly to the vitality of the College.

CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80's COMPLETES SECOND RECORD SETTING YEAR

On June 30, 1982, the CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80'S completed its second consecutive record-setting year. Gifts and grants received during the past fiscal year amounted to $3,394,745, and contributions and pledges to the Campaign effort now total $10,583,447.

Funds generated by the Campaign have been used to complete an Annex to the College Union Building, to renovate the Holroyd Science Center, to begin construction of a new dormitory and dining hall for resident students, to establish a special endowment program for faculty development, to provide financial aid for middle income students, to expand academic and administrative uses of the Computer Center, to launch new programs (e.g. the M.A. Program in Bilingual/Bicultural Studies for Educators and Other Urban Professionals, and the M.A. Program in Education), to expand and diversify the technical assistance programs sponsored by the Urban Center, to acquire instructional equipment for the Communication Arts Program, and to develop and implement an innovative Management Training program for social service, non-profit agencies in Philadelphia.

The CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80'S is La Salle's most ambitious fund-raising effort in history, and we still have a long way to go to reach our goal of $15 million by June 30, 1983. With intensified support from all of our constituencies, we are optimistic that we will achieve our objective, and will enhance the quality and vitality of the College for the next decade.

The De La Salle Society

The DE LA SALLE SOCIETY is comprised of alumni/ae, faculty/staff, and friends of La Salle College who made gifts of $5,000 or more to the CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80's in 1981-82. The Society derives its name from St. John Baptist De La Salle (1651-1719), the founder of the Christian Brothers and the Patron of the College.

NEW DORMITORY & CAFETERIA

La Salle's new $6.6 million dormitory and cafeteria, one of the key projects of the college's CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80'S, is now under construction on the northwest part of the campus and slated for occupancy in September, 1983.

The much-needed dormitory project was made possible when the Department of Housing and Urban Development selected La Salle as one of six institutions of higher education in the nation to receive a low-interest $5 million loan. La Salle is raising the additional $1.6 million to complete the project.

In addition to alleviating the long waiting list for dormitory accommodations, the new three story project will permit the resident students to have their meals at a convenient location while reducing pedestrian traffic at the busy 20th St. and Olney Ave. intersection.

Construction underway with Hayman Hall in the background.

THE CENTURY CLUB is made up of those alumni/ae, faculty/staff, and friends of La Salle College who contributed $100 or more, but less than $250, to the CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80'S in 1981-82.

GIFTS OF ART

During the past fiscal year, a number of individuals have generously contributed works of art to the La Salle College Art Gallery. These contributions have served to enrich the educational and cultural resources which the Art Gallery provides for the general public, the College's students, faculty, alumni and friends, and neighborhood residents in communities proximate to La Salle. The total value of Gifts of Art contributed during 1981-82 is estimated at $86,022. The Gallery is, indeed, especially grateful to its many friends and benefactors including:

DEFERRED GIFTS

During 1981-82, La Salle received commitments from the following individuals who established bequests, insurance policies, or trust arrangements naming the College as a beneficiary. The College is indeed most grateful to its many generous friends and alumni who have aided it in this particular fashion:

Estate of Emmet A. Fitzgerald
Estate of Edmund C. Koch
William F. McGonigal
Mr. and Mrs. Francis A. Sevier, Sr.

Dr. Warren E. Smith
Estate of Joseph B. Quinn
Mr. and Mrs. A. William Uhlein
John H. Veen

Those who are interested in obtaining information on various deferred giving possibilities (wills, bequests, insurance programs, trusts, etc.) should contact Dr. Fred J. Foley, Jr., Director of Development, c/o Development Office, La Salle College, Philadelphia, PA, 19141, (215) 951-1540.

VOLUNTEERS LEAD SUCCESSFUL FUND RAISING EFFORT

The record-setting results achieved by the Alumni Annual Fund component of the CAMPAIGN FOR THE 80's reflect the extraordinary efforts of the entire La Salle family: alumni/ae, faculty, staff, friends and students. Nearly 200 persons conducted the telephone phase of our Campaign in sixteen major phonathons. The members of the Alumni Annual Fund Executive Committee deeply appreciate the generosity of those companies that hosted the phonathons—

Arthur Andersen and Company
Coopers and Lybrand
Fidelcor, Inc.
Industrial Valley Bank and Trust Company
Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Company
Price Waterhouse and Company
Prudential Insurance Company
Touche Ross and Company

and are especially grateful for the unfailing assistance of the phonathon volunteers:

Bishop and Nobel Prize Winner Among Honorees at 119th Commencement

An Auxiliary Bishop of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, a Nobel Prize winner, and a prominent philanthropist were awarded honorary doctor of laws degrees at La Salle College's 119th commencement exercises on May 16 at Philadelphia's Civic Center-Convention Hall.

The Most Rev. Louis A. DeSimone, Auxiliary Bishop of Philadelphia; Baruch S. Blumberg, M.D., Ph.D., associate director for clinical research at The Institute for Cancer Research, and Arthur C. Kaufmann, director of Independence National Historical Park, received the honorary degrees.

Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D., conferred bachelor's degrees on 1,189 men and women including 207 Evening Division students. Another 154 men and women received master's degrees in business administration, and 38 students were awarded master's degrees in religion.

Bishop DeSimone was sponsored for his degree by Brother Andrew Bartley, F.S.C.; Blumberg, by Morton S. Mandell, M.D., and Kaufmann, by James Binns, Esq. All of the sponsors are members of the college's Board of Trustees.

Bishop DeSimone was honored as a priest, teacher, pastor and administrator who "has left an indelible mark as a man of faith, hope and love." In conferring his degree, Brother Ellis said, "You have brought to the Catholic Church a rich and deeply-rooted citizen-awareness of the true character of our city, its neighborhoods, and its heritage. As a low-key executive, you have made compassion effective both locally and abroad."

Dr. Blumberg was honored for his "distinguished accomplishments in biological research, work of great intellectual elegance and human significance."

Kaufmann, a driving force behind the development of the historic Independence Mall Historic area in the 1950's, was honored for his many "major contributions to our city's international impact, and truly extraordinary service to all of us in Philadelphia."

Bishop DeSimone has served in a variety of archdiocesan capacities including the director of Catholic Relief Services and chairman of the Heritage Group Committee for the 41st International Eucharistic Congress. In 1979, he was named a Diocesan Consultor and a member of the Council of Managers of the Archdiocesan Office for Development.

In 1976, after serving as coordinator of the Italian Earthquake Relief Fund for Friuli, the Italian Government awarded him the "Commendator al Merito della Repubblica Italiana." After the earthquake which devastated southern Italy in 1980, Bishop DeSimone, at the request of Cardinal Krol, made a first-hand inspection of the disaster area. Then, he coordinated a $500,000 fund-raising effort in the Archdiocese of Philadelphia in the space of seven weeks to provide modular homes in the earthquake area.

Dr. Blumberg was awarded a Nobel Prize for Medicine in 1976 for his discovery of a chemical marker in the blood showing the presence of hepatitis-B, the most severe and often-fatal form of the liver inflammation known as viral hepatitis. This finding helped make possible the now-standard test for screening out hepatitis-B carriers among prospective blood donors, and it paved the way for an experimental anti-hepatitis-B vaccine that may also be effective against liver cancer.

A native of New York City and a former officer in the U.S. Navy, Dr. Blumberg is a graduate of Union College. He earned his M.D. at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia University, in 1951, and his Ph.D. in biochemistry at Oxford University, in England, in 1957.

Dr. Blumberg's current appointments include University Professor of Medicine and Anthropology, University of Pennsylvania; staff member, Jeanes Hospital, American Oncologic Hospital, Philadelphia, and attending physician, Veterans Administration Hospital of the University of Pennsylvania, and Pennsylvania Hospital.

Kaufmann, a native of Pittsburgh, is president of Arthur C. Kaufmann and Associates, Inc., business management consultants. He served as director and executive head of Gimbel Brothers, Inc., in Philadelphia from 1934 to 1959; as president of Gimbel Brothers Bank and Trust Co., from 1950 to 1958, and chairman of the board and director of the Pennsylvania Broadcasting Co. (radio station WIP) from 1950 to 1958.

Among others, Kaufmann is a trustee of The Lankenau Hospital and Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts; and a director of Old Philadelphia Development Corp., Greater Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, World Affairs Council of Philadelphia, Area Council for Economic Education, and the Citizen's Crime Commission of Philadelphia.

La Salle's annual U.S. Army Reserve Officers Training Corps (ROTC) commissioning ceremony was held for 15 new officers on Saturday (May 15), in the College Union Ballroom. The Baccalaureate Mass was celebrated later that day at the Cathedral Basilica of SS. Peter and Paul.

Noted Heart Surgeon Gives Holroyd Lecture; Dr. Sterling Honored

Michael E. DeBakey, M.D., the noted pioneer in the treatment of cardiovascular diseases, delivered the third annual Holroyd Lecture on April 30, in the La Salle College Union Ballroom, on campus.

Dr. DeBakey, who is the chancellor of Baylor College of Medicine and chairman of its Department of Surgery, discussed "Significant Developments in Cardiovascular Diseases" at the invitation-only lecture which was co-sponsored by La Salle's School of Arts and Sciences and Alumni Medical Association.

Immediately proceeding Dr. DeBakey's lecture, the third annual Holroyd award was presented to Francis H. Sterling, M.D., a La Salle College graduate who is associate professor of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania and a past president of the Philadelphia Endocrine Society. This award is named in honor of Dr. Roland Holroyd, La Salle College's distinguished biology professor emeritus.

During his surgical career, Dr. DeBakey has made numerous contributions as a medical inventor and innovator, a dedicated teacher, and a medical statesman. He is currently the director of the National Heart and Blood Vessel Research and Demonstration Center, Houston, Texas.

Dr. DeBakey introduced the pump now used in the heart-lung machine, developed over 50 new surgical instruments, and has pioneered in the development of the artificial heart. The Dacron replacement arteries he conceived and developed are used throughout the world.

Dr. DeBakey's surgical firsts include: successful excision and graft replacement of arterial aneurysms, first successful use of a heart pump in a patient, and the first successful carotid endarterectomy which established the field of surgery for strokes.

In 1964, he performed the first aortocoronary artery bypass with autogenous saphenous vein graft, thus establishing the field of coronary bypass surgery.

In 1968, he led a team of surgeons in performing a historic multiple transplantation procedure in which the heart, kidneys, and one lung of a donor were each transplanted to four different recipients.

In recognition of Dr. DeBakey's dedication to the training of young physicians, in 1976 his students founded the Michael E. DeBakey International Cardiovascular Society composed of members from all over the world.

A native of Louisiana, Dr. DeBakey received his medical degree from Tulane University. Following a residency at Charity Hospital, in New Orleans, he pursued further studies at Strasbourg and Heidelberg.

Previous Holroyd Lecturers at La Salle have been Dr. Edward Stemmler, dean of the University of Pennsylvania Medical School (1980), and Dr. John Potts, chief of staff, Massachusetts General Hospital (1981).

Titles by Men Swimmers And Women's Softball Teams Highlight Year

The La Salle College athletic program once again enjoyed a healthy year. The men's soccer team and women's field hockey team got the ball rolling in the fall, the swimmers had their best year

Dr. Raymond P. Heath (center), the college's vice president for student affairs, presents first annual Scholar Athlete awards to Patty Dugan and Carl Maler. Dugan was captain of women's basketball team and a sprinter on the track team. She graduated with a 3.7 index in accounting. Maler, an All East swimmer, graduated with a 3.5 average as a marketing/management major.

ever, and fine seasons by the softball and baseball teams climaxed the year.

Coach Bill Wilkinson led the Explorer booters to an outstanding 10-3-2 record in the fall which was highlighted by a 2-1 upset of eventual national runner-up Philadelphia Textile. Led by the scoring of junior Russ Bono (11 goals, 1 assist) and the defense anchored by All-East Coast Conference goaltender Mike Kogut, the Explorers were able to finish the season with an eight game unbeaten string. In addition to Kogut, Bono and senior midfielder Pete Zimmermann were also selected to the ECC All-Star team.

Joan Broderick's defending national champion field hockey team, facing its most demanding schedule ever, was able to finish with a 14-8-3 record. Five of those losses were Division I powerhouses such as Penn State and Temple, teams that finished first and second in the Division I national tournament. The team qualified for the national tournament in Ithaca, NY after dropping the regional title to Lock Haven State. After defeating Eastern Illinois in the first-round of the national tournament, La Salle again lost to Lock Haven.

Individual honors went to senior Kathy McGahey who was named to the AIAW Division II All-America team, making her the first two-sport All-America at La Salle (last year she was named to the AIAW Division II softball team.) After the season, Coach Broderick announced that she has accepted a position at Mt. Holyoke College in Massachusetts. She posted a 33-14-3 record at La Salle, including the school's first national championship since 1955.

The men's cross country team enjoyed one of its finest dual meet seasons with a 9-2 record which included a resounding win over the always tough Penn Quakers before finishing with a fifth place finish in the ECC Championships.

Coach George Phillips' women's cross country team ended with a 2-3 dual meet record highlighted by victories over St. Joseph's and Mt. St. Mary's.

In Marge Kriebel's last season as head coach of the women's volleyball team, the spikers hit a low point during tournaments at Towson State and Navy which resulted in a 14-17 season mark. Eleven of the losses came during those tournaments. Coach Kriebel was awarded the Mary S. O'Connor Award for her long service and dedication to women's athletics at La Salle.

Another coach who has retired from La Salle, women's tennis coach Rita Rohfling, enjoyed her best year at the helm of her team. Finishing with an 8-3 season mark, the women netters were able to finish second in the PAIAW. The team won its first six matches of the season.

The most successful team of the 1981-82 year was Paul Katz' men's swimming team. The swimmers dropped the first meet of the year to Maryland by a single point, but were not to be defeated again. After a 10-1 dual meet record, the ECC championships were never in question as La Salle outdistanced runner-up Drexel by 60 points. It was the third consecutive conference title for Katz, a first for a La Salle athletic team. Katz now has the best winning percentage of active coaches at La Salle.

At the Eastern Seaboard Championships at Army, a meet annually dominated by Ivy League schools, an Ivy school again won the meet, but the Explorers finished second to Harvard, the highest finish ever for La Salle. Seven Explorer swimmers earned ECAC All-East for great performances at the seaboard. The seven were Carl Maler, Paul Jarvis, Bill Warrender, Grier Schaffer, Rich McElwee, Brian Kelca and Craig Cummings. Maler, Jarvis, Warrender and Schaffer also qualified for the NCAA Championships in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

The women's swimming team finished 8-4 in dual meets and placed third in the PAIAW Championships held in Kirk Pool. At the national meet in Moscow, ID, two Explorers earned All-American recognition. Maureen Ferguson, only a freshman, earned a spot for her efforts in the 200-yard backstroke while senior Kathy Smith returned home with her fourth All-America certificate. She became La Salle's only four-time All-America.

Kevin Gallagher directed the women's basketball team to a 17-12 record in his second year as coach. A championship in the Dial Classic Tournament at Northeastern University and a second place finish in the strong eight-team field of the La Salle-Lady Michelob Tournament highlighted the season. Individual accolades came to senior Kathy Bess who was named to the Women's Big 5 All-Star team. The 6'1" center also etched her name into the college's record books when she broke the school record for rebounds in a career. She finished her four-year career with 1,145 rebounds and is also the Explorers' second all-time scorer.

The men's basketball team overcame a murderous December schedule and the inconsistency of youth to post a 16-13 record, the third straight winning season for Coach Dave "Lefty" Ervin. A season-opening game at Duke and tournaments at Brigham Young, San Francisco and Connecticut were all scheduled in December, but Ervin was able to direct the team to a 5-6 record into the new year.

With four freshmen and a junior comprising the starting line-up, the Explorers were one of the youngest teams in the nation as well as being one of the most traveled. Steve Black quickly became one of the best first-year players in the nation. The 6'3" guard led the NCAA Division I freshmen in scoring with a 20.0 per game average to earn several Freshman All-America citations.

With Black leading the way and strong support from Tom Piotrowski,

Patricia Mosko, a nursing supervisor at Episcopal Hospital, was honored as the outstanding graduate of the college's Department of Nursing at a reception honoring the first class to complete the new program. Brother Claude Demitras, dean of the Evening Division, made the presentation.

Baseball coach Gene McDonnell, '55 (left), and soccer coach Bill Wilkinson were honored for reaching important milestones this year. McDonald won his 300th game at La Salle; Wilkinson picked up his 100th career triumph.

Ralph Lewis, Albert Butts and Pete Tiano, La Salle disposed of such teams as Notre Dame, Rice and Duquesne. St. Joseph's ended the Explorers season in the semi-finals of the ECC Championship.

In his 24th season at the helm, Gene McDonnell directed his baseball squad to a school record 23 wins. The coach also chalked up a personal milestone with his 300th career win, a 15-12 decision over Villanova.

La Salle won the championship of the Florida Baseball School after winning six of eight games. The Explorers then downed eventual ECC champion Delaware and senior pitcher Jeff Hentz followed that with a no-hit game against Philadelphia Textile. Junior first baseman Tom Bonk virtually rewrote the La Salle record books in being named first-team All-ECC and also first-team NCAA East Region All-Star team. Senior Mark Swiski joined Bonk on the ECC All-Star team. Bonk, Swiski and Hentz were all selected in the major league free agent draft in early June.

On the women's diamond, Rick Pohlig led the Explorer softball team to another highly successful season, an 18-10 record and another PAIAW Championship.

After defeating Southern Connecticut State in a best of three "play down" the team advanced to defend its EAIAW Championship. La Salle beat Delaware and West Chester but, Ithaca College ruined any softball World Series plans, however, by taking two games, 5-4 and 4-0. Sophomore shortstop Julie Reidenauer became the school's second softball All-America in as many years, while pitcher Vici Smith was the Wheelan and Wheelan Award winner for her sport.

The men's tennis team continued its resurgence behind Coach Jeff Marmon with a 6-6 record.

The men's golf team shot its way through sloppy courses and inclement weather to a 4-6 season record and a seventh place finish in the conference tournament.

The newest sport at La Salle, the wrestling team of Coach Steve Peters, managed but two wins during the 17 meet season, over Haverford and Loyola (MD). Ed Reitmyer became the first Explorer wrestler to score in the East Coast Conference Championship meet.

The men's crew team celebrated the return of Coach Jim Kiernan with a 9-1 record, while the varsity lightweight 8 had a perfect 10-0 slate. The heavyweights captured the President's Cup, while finishing second in the Bergen Cup and fifth in the Dad Vails.

Gavaghan's track team was quite successful during the indoor and outdoor seasons as the Explorers finished second in both ECC Championships. Freshmen Marcos Edghill and Rob Irvine and senior Mike Mosley and Tom Flach performed well in the indoor championships. Edghill captured the 60 high hurdles with Irvine finishing second, while Mosley raced to victory in the 60 dash. Flach was the conference champion in the long jump.

The spring track season was highlighted by a strong showing in the Colonial Relays at William & Mary, where the team shattered many records, including the steeplechase by sophomore Brent Barnhill, and the 400-meter relay, 800-meter relay and the distance medley relay.

Alumni Directory to be Published

La Salle has authorized the preparation of a new alumni directory, the college's first since 1978, which should be a valuable reference volume for alumni who wish to know where their friends are and what they are doing now. Release of the directory is tentatively scheduled for late 1983.

The project will be undertaken at virtually no cost to La Salle. The Bernard C. Harris Publishing Company, Inc. of White Plains, NY, has been selected to compile, publish, and market the directory, financial the operation solely through the sale of individual copies to alumni only.

The college will not benefit financially from the directory sales (purchases should not be considered as a contribution), but will derive substantial benefit from the completely updated records and other valuable information obtained.

The main body of the directory will consist of an alphabetical listing of alumni with cross references by maiden and married name, with each entry to include name, class, degree, home address and telephone, and business or professional information, including title, firm name and address, and telephone. Two complete indexes of all alumni, one arranged geographically by towns within states, and the other by class year will follow the main listings, providing ready references and cross references.

This updated material will be derived from brief questionnaires mailed to alumni with know addresses and followed up by telephone for verification of the information to be included in the directory. At that time only, alumni will be invited to purchase a copy of the directory. Only enough directories to fill these pre-publication orders will be printed, and circulation will be restricted to alumni.

The Alumnae Committee of the Alumni Association will sponsor a Flea Market in the College Union Ballroom on Saturday, October 9 from 10:00 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. The beneficiary will be the Building Blocks Day Care Center. Space may be reserved by contacting Mary Beth Bryers, the assistant director of alumni (951-1671).

The annual Alumni Awards dinner will be held in the College Union Ballroom on Friday evening, November 19. The Awards Committee, under the chairmanship of Alumni Association Executive Vice President Philip E. Hughes, Jr., Esq., '71, will propose its candidate for the Association's Signum Fidei medal to the September 15 meeting of the Alumni Board of Directors.

The Signum Fidei medal has been given each year since 1942 to recognize personal achievement in harmony with the established aims of La Salle College and the objectives of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, and is awarded annually to a person who has made "most noteworthy contributions to the achievement of humanitarian principles in keeping with the Judeo-Christian tradition."

Last year for the first time the Signum Fidei medal was conferred on a couple: William and Helene Sample, for their work with the Sunshine Foundation—making the dreams of terminally and chronically ill children come true. At this dinner also, the Alpha Epsilon Alumni Honor Society will induct those seniors selected in recognition of their scholarship along with their participation in the extracurricular life of the College.

La Salle College in Europe

For hundreds of students, a year in Switzerland has meant an unforgettable, delightful opportunity to explore, travel, learn, grow and mature

By Robert S. Lyons, Jr., '61

Fete Dieu, the feast of Corpus Christi, 1954. Brother D. John, F.S.C., Ph.D., is touring Europe on his bicycle, working his way through the Swiss countryside. It's just a gorgeous day as Brother John pedals into the center of Fribourg where a solemn, yet colorful procession is winding its way through the quaint cobblestone streets. It includes the Papal Swiss Guards, the Army, and members of various religious congregations. Students from the university and local schools, dressed in multicolored outfits are waving flags and banners as they sing hymns in Latin and in French. It's a ritual being repeated in scores of towns and cities in Europe on this Sunday after Pentecost, but somehow this scene in Fribourg is one that Brother John will never forget. He files it away and, six years later, it all comes back—the charm, the unique combination of a French/German-speaking community in a Catholic university environment. The perfect location for La Salle College in Europe!

"Yes, I remember that trip," Brother John recalled recently. Better known today as Brother William Quinn, he was dean of the college in the 1950s and, later, La Salle's first academic vice president. "We were planning a 'Junior Year Abroad' program to give language majors an educational and cultural experience a long way from home. Other sites were considered in Spain, France, and Italy, but Fribourg's language versatility, combined with the fact that it was the site of an excellent—and very cooperative Catholic university—made it a magnificent setting for our purposes."

With Dr. John Guischard, '38, a highly-respected French professor at the college serving as Brother John's chief advisor (and the program's first director), La Salle College in Europe became a reality in 1960 when 14 young men sailed on the Liberte' and spent the year in Fribourg. Charles A. Glackin, Esq., '60, postponed plans to attend Law School to serve as resident director in Switzerland. "John Guischard (now a priest in Vermont) responded enthusiastically to the linguistic advantages of Fribourg and did much of the legwork getting the program off the ground," says Brother Quinn. "Both he and Glackin made important contributions. They were extremely helpful."

Today, La Salle College in Europe is one of the college's most popular programs, not only in Fribourg where La Salle sponsors the American College Program in consortium with Providence College, but also in Spain where students have the choice of three separate options. All of La Salle's overseas programs are coordinated by Dr. Leonard Brownstein, adviser to U.S. students abroad and associate professor of Spanish.

The Spanish programs include:

—Undergraduate Program at Seville, where students can spend either one or two semesters at the University of Seville and live with private families in the city. La Salle is a charter member of the consortium operated by the Council on International Exchange and now comprised of 44 colleges and universities. Last year 30 Spanish majors from La Salle participated.

—Academic Year Abroad, in Madrid. Some 11 La Salle students have participated in this program at the University of Madrid in the nation's capital since La Salle joined the program in 1980. Non-language majors are also eligible. Brownstein has framed some of the courses offered in Spanish history, literature, art, and geography and is attempting to institute business topics.

—Bryn Mawr Program in Spain, initiated in 1965, where students can take summer courses. "This is the most outstanding summer program in Spain," says Brownstein, who was a member of the faculty, teaching language and methodology for six years. All students live with Spanish families.

"All of these programs add prestige to the college," says Brownstein. "Students broaden their cultural horizons. They learn to live on their own away from their families in a foreign culture. They get extensive international experience. They get exposed to different educational systems. They acquire more of a cosmopolitan attitude because they meet students from all over the world."

About 500 men and women from La Salle have participated in the American College Program at Fribourg. In addition, La Salle regularly admits a considerable number of students from other institutions into the program. They have come from Boston College, California/Berkley, the

The University of Fribourg is the only Roman Catholic college in Switzerland.

University of Pennsylvania, Chestnut Hill, Boston University, Fairfield, Vermont, and the University of Wisconsin, among others. Unlike some other programs, the ACP enjoys official recognition by the University of Fribourg which enables La Salle to give academic credit. Students are eligible to take some of the university's regular courses. The ACP supplements these offerings with courses designed to satisfy the specific requirements of American curricula. Half of the students at the University of Fribourg are from Swiss-dialect, German-speaking cantons. Others come from throughout Europe and Africa. It is not unusual for La Salle students, therefore, to attend a class at Fribourg with students from such countries as Iran, Saudi Arabia, Yugoslavia, Equador, France, Germany, and Switzerland.

"This program almost redefines the meaning of education," says Brother Arthur Bangs, F.S.C., Ph.D., who recently completed a three year term as director of the American College Program in Switzerland. "The enrichment is just tremendous. The opportunity to travel is a dream of a lifetime. Just look at the academic benefits—the exposure to European methods of teaching, the lectures, the courses that are unavailable in America. It's so enriching to interact with students from various cultures, mentalities, and nationalities. But the big thing is that they learn to be independent. They are on their own. No one tells them when to get up, where to eat. They have to make their own financial decisions. It's a growing situation. They come as boys and girls and leave as pretty poised young men and women."

At least one La Salle student never really did leave. Gerard (Matt) Temme, '69, spent his junior year at Fribourg. He went right back to Switzerland after picking up his bachelor's degree in English, married a young Swiss lady, got a high school teaching job, and is now living in Fribourg.

Until this year, La Salle students had their choice of attending classes at Fribourg either for one or two semesters. Now, however, they must attend both semesters. The normal academic year in Europe extends from the third week in October until the beginning of July with a seven week break between the winter and summer semesters. The summer session lasts only ten weeks, however, and college officials feel that such a semester is too short to experience enough of the academic atmosphere of the university.

"Financially it is tempting to keep the spring semester going," says Brother Emery Mollenhauer, F.S.C., Ph.D., the college's provost. "But in the interest of academic integrity, a full year is necessary for students to benefit adequately from the program." Noting that European courses and programs are sequenced for the full academic year consisting of 18 and 10 week semesters, Brother Mollenhauer pointed out that full-year students have twice as much time to benefit from the language and culture. "It usually takes a few months just to get the courage and confidence to speak the language," he added. The full-year policy will be reviewed, however, with the possibility that a one semester program could be reinstated in the future, perhaps as a "pre-session."

Brother Mollenhauer says that he is very happy with La Salle in Europe although he wishes that more students would take advantage of the program. "It's just an excellent opportunity for our students to experience another cultural dimension," he says. "It's a distinction that adds to the college's educational program because it's such a different, worthwhile, and enriching experience that opens up a whole new world. Fribourg is truly and international city."

Financially, La Salle in Europe is an excellent educational bargain. Tuition, fees, round-trip airfare, and housing at Fribourg is only $4,200 for the year which extends from the end of September until July 1.

Highly-regarded as a bilingual educational center, Fribourg combines an intriguing blend of a rustic but refined atmosphere with its Gothic architecture and medieval sculpture. As a city, Fribourg has grown considerably in its 800 years. But you can almost picture the weavers, tanners, and blacksmiths toiling in the Middle Ages as you stroll through the Bas Ville (lower city) with much of the natural walls of sheer rock still intact. The Free Town was originally a crown of houses bordering a terrace on a cliff top. Now many of its 40,000 residents work for multinational firms like Philco-Ford, Burroughs, and Ampex and live in some of the more modern residential districts. Situated between lakes and mountains—just two hours by road or rail from Geneva or Zurich—Fribourg is one of the world's most picturesque cities. The city offers an excellent atmosphere for LaSalle's students who all live in local homes, rooms, or apartments within walking distance of the university.

Academically, LaSalle in Europe originated with French and German majors. It is still a popular program today for language majors although it has continually attracted more men and women in the humanities. Universities like Fribourg place heavy emphasis on such disciplines as political science and philosophy. Students majoring in the sciences or business sometimes have more difficulty finding courses that fulfill their requirements. Some thought has been given to encouraging these students to attend Fribourg as sophomores rather than juniors before they concentrate on their major field of study at La Salle. Dr. Brownstein says that he would like to develop a multinational business program taught by Swiss professors as part of the ACP at Fribourg, possibly utilizing apprenticeships with banks and travel agencies.

Ideally, participants at La Salle in Europe should have a working knowledge of French or German although its requirement is occasionally waived if the student demonstrates enough interest in the language. Courses arranged through the American College Program are designed to supplement those offered by the university that may have strict language requirements.

Dr. Albert Eisenring, a Swiss professor of English Literature, has probably taught more La Salle students in the American College Program than anyone else. He is retiring this year after two decades of teaching. Fluent in English, French, and German, Dr. Eisenring is an internationally-recognized scholar who authored a page in the Catholic Encyclopedia of America on Fribourg. Some of his more popular courses have been "Culture of the History of England," "Modern English Grammar," and "Critical Readings" of such authors as Green, Conrad, and Waugh. "Dr. Eisenring is really an exciting teacher," said Mariana Brown, a communications major who spent last year in Fribourg. "The only professor I know who makes you want to get up at 8:00 A.M. for class."

Dr. Lazlo Revesz, a student leader in the 1956 Hungarian Revolution, commutes from Bern once a week to teach "History of the Organization of the Communist Party" in English and German. Known by scores of students for his "vivid recollections of his personal experiences," Dr. Revesz has written 31 books.

Two other professors at the University of Fribourg have ranked high with La Salle students over the years. Dr. Marthe Borsky, who has been with the ACP from the beginning, speaks five languages including Chinese and Spanish. She accompanies students on a land tour of Charles A. Glackin, Esq., '60, majored in English and History at La Salle, picked up a little French as an elective, and fully expected to spend the year after graduation in Law School.

Instead, he found himself sailing across the Atlantic Ocean on the Liberte, during the summer of 1960 to establish La Salle in Europe at the University of Fribourg at the request of Brother D. John, F.S.C., Ph.D., the dean of the college and a close friend. It was an exciting time to be in Europe. Glackin represented the college at a world-wide conference of the Brothers of the Christian Schools which was held in Rome at the same time the Eternal City was hosting the Olympic Games. Then he headed for Switzerland where he was to experience "the best year of my life." It was also the busiest.

In addition to setting up academic rosters, arranging housing the Don Bosco House on the outskirts of town, and handling thousands of other details, Glackin had what you might call a full schedule. He taught a history seminar to the La Salle students. He took courses at the university in international law. He taught English language and literature at St. Michael's College, in Fribourg. He put 60,000 kilometers on his car. And he taught "Theory of Marxism and Practical Communism" in French to the Prime Minister of Katanga and 19 of his country men. (Most of them, tragically, were killed or exiled in a political upheaval that devastated their nation shortly thereafter).

Glackin says that his first priority was to maintain the college's academic standards. "We weren't there just on a holiday and the European system of grading was extremely difficult," he recalled recently. "It was absolutely amazing how we learned so much in such a short period of time. The awareness that people in other parts of the world don't think your way, I think, is an important thing to know. I was very proud of the willingness of our kids to accept the fact that there were other ways of looking at things. They didn't always do it with a smile, and maybe they complained, but lo and behold they eventually did it."

Basketball, recalls Glackin, was a "Godsend" because it was the major icebreaker that established rapport

France, Germany, and Switzerland when they first arrive at La Salle in Europe. Dr. Anthony Mortimer, the chairman of the English Department of Fribourg, has taught at universities in Italy and Yugoslavia.

Although the atmosphere in the European university classroom is much different than the United States (very little questions or discussion in class), most of the La Salle students at Fribourg last year came home with memorable academic experiences. Ronald Rock, '82, who expects to attend The Catholic University Law School, found himself traveling to United Nations headquarters in Geneva to do research for courses in "International Space Law" and "International Public Law." Mary Trautwein, a management major with a concentration in international studies, conducted a case study of the market structure of a Swiss company for an "Economics for Enterprise" course and took her oral examination in French. Christine Loughlin, a marketing major, rostered a class in the German Institute where all students, including Americans, Africans, French, and Turks, were required to speak German. Kelly Walker, a finance/marketing major, was required to translate a French book into English.

Outside the classroom, the La Salle students were encouraged to mingle and participate in various activities in the city. Most of them did. Some joined the local choir or played in the community orchestra. A few women played on a local ice hockey team. Others joined a basketball team comprised of Americans, French, and German or enrolled in a Fitness Class conducted in French. The American College Program formed its own intramural basketball team and won the University of Fribourg championship. There was also plenty of Alpine hiking and with the Swiss people who are fairly private and very reserved. "Any of our men, 5-6 or over were much sought-after by Swiss basketball teams," Glackin said. "Anyone 6 feet or over was just great. Our feet don't move like the Europeans in soccer and their arms don't move like ours in basketball. I give our kids credit for cracking the rigidity and aloofness that they encountered. It was quite a chore to meet the natives and communicate with them."

There was a lot of stress at the beginning as the students struggled to adjust to the European way of life. "The little things grated on you," Glackin said. Only limited water was available for showers and, often, it was cold. The food was different. So were clothing sizes. Professors turned "crimson" if you raised a hand in class. It was difficult to plan economically because of the changing value of the Swiss franc. There was an early-to-bed lifestyle. "Amazingly we were so different, yet so compatible as a group. Soon people took on the attitude that it was an exciting thing. Like the Army, afterwards you only remember the happy times."

Glackin, himself, learned a lesson in Swiss formality the hard way. One night, at 10 P.M. he telephoned Professor Albert Eisenring, who taught a number of La Salle's students that year. "Eisenring was a very charming, precise man," Glackin said. "Students responded to him because he was quite a scholar and he spoke beautiful English. But on this particular night he was absolutely stunned because, as I learned later, 9:00 P.M. is the accepted cutoff time for telephoning. His conversation was so frozen and rigid, I could feel the icicles. He was formal and polite but I got the message. Later, when I apologized he was quite candid: 'You just don't do that,' he said."

A number of things impressed

Glackin that first year—the "diversity of interest" of La Salle's students, the excellent cooperation of the university, the way he and the students were eventually warmly received and highly-respected by the people of Fribourg.

Everyone, of course wanted to travel and often stayed at youth hostels for 50¢ a night. It was also a golden opportunity for many of the young men to return to their cultural roots. Two Jewish students worked on a banana kaboutz in Israel for 40 days. Another student visited his ancestors in Germany's Black Forest. Glackin visited his grandfather and other relatives in Ireland. He spent his "most exquisite Christmas" in Innsbruck, arriving for his first look at the Alps in a driving snowstorm. He also made it to the final day-long performance of the Oberammergau Passion Play, "one of the most extraordinary experiences I've ever had."

Because there had been a frequent skiing, cycling, and soccer. For films or chess sessions, Bern was only 20 minutes away.

There was also plenty of time to see Europe and Africa during the seven week break between semesters, the Christmas vacation, and long Pentecost weekend. "Travel was an excellent classroom," said Brian Jones, an international marketing major. "You could hop on a train one night and be in a totally new place with an entirely different culture, currency, language, and way of life. There's so much to see that you feel that you're walking through history." Most students purchased relatively-inexpensive "Euro-Rail" passes good throughout the continent via the excellent European railroad system and, also, to Greece and Ireland by boat. Students relied heavily on Let's Go Europe, a travel "bible" written for students by the Harvard Student Association.

For some La Salle students, it wasn't until they traveled to Paris that the magnitude of their journey abroad hit home. "I'll never forget it," recalled Ron Rock. "It was rainy and cold. We were all chilly, hungry, and exhausted. We turned this corner and suddenly we all saw it together, the Eiffel Tower." "There it was as big as life," said Chrissy Loughlin. "I had seen it in the movies, but it was then that I realized, 'Hey, we're in Europe.'" "When we saw it," added Dennis Owens, "we stopped, stood there, and just looked at it for about five minutes."

There were many other memories: the natural beauty of the Alps . . . Anne Frank's House in Germany . . . the "Sound of Music" tour in Salzburg, Austria. . . the Olympic Stadiums in Innsbruck and Munich . . . the Bucks County residents in the group cheering as the Neshaminy High School band passed them during a St. Patrick's Day tendency of the students to stay among themselves rather than circulate and absorb the Swiss culture and language, college officials made a decision to arrange for students to live with local families the following year. Glackin also explored other possible sites for La Salle's program in Germany, Spain, and France. "We decided to stay, because we were more comfortable in Fribourg," he said. "It's a very easy place to fall in love with."

Glackin returned to the United States the following year and enrolled as a scholarship student at Georgetown University's Law School where he also served as assistant dean of men. He was tax counsel for the Standard Oil Co. for awhile and has returned to Europe dozens of times. "It's funny," he recalled. "My memories of these (business trips) are just flashing recollections. But the memories of that year in Fribourg are very acute, very keen, very precise."—RSL

Dmytro Kulchycky, a political science major, caught up with his uncle, Dr. Leo D. Rudnytsky, '58, a professor of German and Slavic languages at La Salle, in July and accompanied him to Rome and Munich while Rudnytsky lectured at St. Clement's Ukrainian Catholic University and the Ukrainian Free University in Germany.

"It's been quite educational, a revelation," said Jacqueline Betancourt, a language major who spent the year at Fribourg with her sister, Ines, a psychology major. "For the first time we've been able to see ourselves through the eyes of Europeans. Some of them idolize you but others are quite un-American. They think we are all rich capitalists who are here on a big picnic. We've learned to be more objective, we've developed different viewpoints."

A year abroad has also made most of the students more patriotic. "Growing up in America and spending your entire life in America, you don't realize all the advantages and freedoms you have here," said Owens, a communications major. "This is not intended to put down the Europeans—because there are many fine things about their lifestyle—but traveling makes you realize how good you have it in America. I learned to appreciate the United States much more than I had before."

Mariana Brown says that she learned that the Americans are not as concerned about politics as Europeans. "We all felt the reverberations when the Polish (Solidarity) crisis hit," she recalled, "because countries are so close to each other in Europe. Living in the United States you don't understand the significance of such political developments. The first thing people here want to discuss is politics—'how do you feel about President Reagan?'—things like that."

To the Betancourts, their memories of encounters with people will remain forever. "I stayed with a little old lady in Greece," Ines recalled. "She had no electricity, no running water, no indoor toilet facilities. She lived on an island near Athens but had never visited that famous Greek city. In fact, she had traveled outside her own town only once in her lifetime. She was 69-years-old."

Perhaps Ron Rock summed up the feelings of the La Salle contingent best when he said, "Everyone has their own horror stories of experiences encountered when we first got here. But we have all learned so much. We've all grown and matured. We came here as a bus load of kids. We had to be spoon-fed with everything. Now we're adults."

"I found more inside myself than I knew I had," said Mariana Brown. "I realized how capable and resourceful I could be when I was on my own. It's knowledge that just can't be obtained in books."

"You're missing an unbelievable opportunity if you don't do it," added Chrissy Loughlin.

Brother Bangs, recently returned to La Salle to teach educational psychology and assist in the college's Counseling Center. Fribourg was an experience he will never forget. "Just learning the details of life here my first few months were very difficult, but delightful," he says. "Eventually, I got an excellent idea of the European perspective, a better grasp of European history and culture, and a tremendous opportunity to explore and travel." ■

At Large in London

By Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D.

The most famous title in America may well be that all-purpose heading for the first English composition in September. And the most written-about city in the world may be London. A fusion of the two seems doubly brash, justified only by my having seen virtually none of my impressions anywhere else, and having enjoyed the human richness and diversity of that city.

Nothing inclusive, therefore, or even totally structured, is offered here. My effort is to use two media to create selected and complementary impressions from a recent visit. It is the sort of thing one wants to try for Philadelphia—undiscovered in so many ways—or one's native town. But one at a time—

London, like any huge city but in a way all its own, can be the most civilized and liveable place in the Western world, then suddenly become the scene of shocking violence. Because of its sheer size and sprawl, it can be both at once. For twenty of twenty-one days during last July, it was at its best.

When a forecaster on the BBC says it will be sultry, he means 77 degrees. When he says it will rain, he is right, but he doesn't mean all day. Thus, London is a city on foot. Even when using subways (the tube, of course) and the ubiquitous but infrequent red buses, one walks a great deal. Some underground transfers, as in Paris, form a decent fraction of the total journey. (And—not having seen Moscow—I have to give London the award for the most vertiginous escalators and thrilling "lifts" at those subway transfer points). One can walk from the center of the city out to the Brothers' headquarters (about four miles) entirely within parks: St. James, Hyde, Green, and Kensington. Many other neighborhoods are contiguous to vast open spaces, each with its own character: Hempstead Heath, near one of our high schools, with its rolling high country, woodlands, and a Robert Adam house; Greenwich, near another of "ours," with a 19th century-style garden, a superb view, and two famous sites, the observatory and the naval college; Richmond, with three hundred deer roaming its six hundred acres; Kew, with thousands of rare plants and trees brought back for study from the once far-flung Empire. All these are inside the city.

Getting to and around London's numerous and often cavernous galleries is another hiking venture, but of course worth it. Very early, one catches on to the special emphases of the main places, and hears of the smaller ones that tend to reflect the taste of one collector. In general, London is the best major center of the arts in terms of hours (virtually every day all day and many evenings) and admissions fees (small or non-existent).

Stark reality sets in, of course, as one submits to a real, not ritual, search of any attache case, satchel, or parcel at the door. For instant memorization, I suggest one of the world's most successful communications, posted in all subway cars and buses, beginning "If you see an unattended bag or parcel . . ."

There are certain rooms in the National Gallery where one could teach aesthetics for a semester. My favorite is one with Turners and Constables intermingled, subtly underscoring the fact that the two painters were virtually contemporaries (b.1775 and '76) but evolved so very differently into exemplars of contrasting schools.

Since school extends nearly through July in England, museums there have the same bustle as American ones in late May, and for many of the same understandable reasons. The British equivalent of the long yellow buses (there, the aging portion of charter fleets), when lined up for blocks, foretell conditions inside the galleries. But the impact is, of course, not all negative. A whole swatch of British life is on view amid the artifacts.

By contrast, being the only visitor at a place like Sion House (much work of Robert Adam, etc.) can make one the recipient of more information than he feels the need of, once that first courteous word is spoken to a very senior, hitherto silent volunteer guide.

Discussing the London concert and theater scene puts a writer into competition with the Sunday travel sections, so I shall merely mention impressions I haven't seen in those pages. What the British may do best is the presentation of massive works that can't be mounted in most places and wouldn't command an audience if they were. All five hours of Berlioz' Trojans, in two evenings, and the same composer's Grande Messe des Morts required forces that few could catch: three hundred singers, ten "name" soloists, augmented brasses in four parts of the house, and so on. This sort of thing goes best in the Albert Hall. Elsewhere, on the South Bank or in perfect little churches like Wren's St. Martin in the Fields, the exact opposite can be found, small ensembles of great verve and precision, and often for free. The latter "academy" has lost the round-the-clock Neville Mariner to St. Paul, Minnesota; but he has been replaced by the stunning Iona Brown, who conducts while playing her violin.

The musical exhumation can make for a delightful evening as well. When would one hear Purcell's King Arthur (book and lyrics by John Dryden), even if the Times critic might sniff that it had been under-rehearsed—as many concerts are in London. The trade-off is that these works are done at all.

Repertory companies suffer from just a shade of under-rehearsal too, I think. But the same trade-off applies, plus the presence of major people who work along in that wonderful stage tradition. First-rate casts were to be seen in The Second Mrs. Tanqueray, Captain Brassbound's Conversion, Hobson's Choice, and more of that sort, playing to good houses in theaters where all seats are in audible range and microphones have never intruded. Some, at least, of the English learn—to—speak.

Shakespeare is still amply represented, even if one stays in the city, though at times routinely. The open-air Midsummer Night's Dream was not memorable, but the same company's Taming of the Shrew was first rate. The absence of all that embarrassing shoving and squalling, and the presence of all the wit, made the play palatable to today's audience. A believable Leontes made The Winter's Tale work, in a budget setting at the new Barbican Center, (one of several halls in a living-and-working complex that is part urban renewal and part madness). As other commentators have noted, repertory schedules are often at odds with planning one's "slots," so that well reviewed productions of Henry IV, I and II, and of A Comedy of Errors got past me. What is clear, however, is that London's leading playwright is still who you think he is.

A word about the sketches. All the sites are within a few blocks of the Brothers' residence in Victoria Road, and were chosen because, collectively, they recreate the ambience for me, and, individually, they are novel enough to be of interest. Big Ben, in other words, has been done before. I offer them, and these reflections, by way of thankful sharing.

Kynance Mews. Once an alley of stables, now a fashionable residential street. Many homes still have the original stable doors. Dimensions, dead end, and cobblestones keep traffic down. Great creativity in plantings that cling, or hang from fences, or spring up in tubs.

Victoria Road. Like Church Lanes hereabouts, there are eight streets of this name in London. (Know your zip code!) This block includes the Brothers' provincial headquarters but is in many ways typical of thousands in London. Renovations and adaptations are rigidly controlled by local government, and only residents may park—at a price.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL AND MONUMENT

PAT ELLIS

The Albert Hall and Monument. Long a target of critical derision, the monument is being reconsidered amid enthusiasm for things Victorian. The hall is the site for, among many other things, most of the fifty-six Prom Concerts every summer. Seating and standing about 8,000, it is an acoustic marvel thanks to recent improvements, and tickets are cheap. A major street—Knightsbridge as it changes to Kensington High, passes between monument and hall.

Bayswater Road may be the world's longest and longest-running outdoor art sale every Sunday, year-round. This sidewalk is the northern border of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, about two miles in all. Media include all the usual, plus textiles, clockwork, feathers, beads, and stained glass.

Kensington High Street. Every neighborhood has a High Street, often dating from its separate existence as a village. We'd say Main. This one mixes Victorian and undistinguished modern structures, housing stores and restaurants of many cultures. Its teeming crowds at almost any hour form a linguistic melange and costume parade that would get a New Yorker's attention. Teenage punk fans with technicolor hair and beaded clothing cause much head-shaking by the umbrella-and-bowler set.

Band Stand. Three days after this calm visit to Kensington's concert site, its twin in Regent's Park became sadly famous. Londoners live in their vast parks on weekends, and are serenaded by military and civilian bands at eight or more locations. The deck chairs (for a slight fee) are universal, as are the swift-footed collectors of the fee. Gardens, beyond this medium of course, are vast, inventive, diverse in style, and indescribably beautiful. Radios are outlawed in all parks.

ESTATE PLANNING IMPLICATIONS OF THE ECONOMIC RECOVERY TAX ACT OF 1981.

By John J. Lombard, Jr., J.D., '56

(This article has been adapted from an article authored by John J. Lombard, Jr. and Kenneth J.
Levin which appeared in the National Law Journal,
September, 1981.)

In the few short paragraphs comprising the three major estate and gift tax provisions of its Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA), the Reagan Administration made the lengthy and detailed provisions of other changes of recent years and the extended commentary and attention they have received pale in significance by comparison. Whereas many of the more significant provisions of the Tax Reform Acts of 1969 and 1976 were designed to eliminate alleged "loopholes" in the existing estate and gift tax laws, the provisions of ERTA not only exempt the estates of the great majority of Americans from any estate and gift tax but also open up whole new areas for planning to avoid, minimize, or postpone tax. This article will address some of the most important implications from a planning standpoint of certain of the major estate and gift tax changes brought about by ERTA.

INCREASE IN THE UNIFIED CREDIT

The Tax Reform Act of 1976 combined the federal estate and gift tax for the first time into a single unified transfer tax so that the cumulative total of transfers previously subject to the two taxes was made subject to the imposition of a single progressive rate schedule. The new unified credit made it possible for a taxpayer to pass $175,525 of assets during his lifetime without being subject to gift tax.

ERTA continues the unified transfer tax system introduced in 1976 but substantially liberalizes the exemption an individual is entitled to. When fully phased in by 1987 there will be no estate or gift tax on cumulative transfers totaling $600,000. The increase is phased in over a six-year period from 1982 through 1987 as follows:

Year	Credit	"Exemption Equivalent"
1982	$ 62,800	$225,000
1983	$ 79,300	$275,000
1984	$ 96,300	$325,000
1985	$121,800	$400,000
1986	$155,800	$500,000
1987 and later	$192,800	$600,000

ERTA also revises the filing requirements to reflect the increased unified credit. Returns are required only if the gross estate of a decedent dying in a particular year exceeds the above-listed "exemption equivalent" for that year.

According to the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation, if the 1981 "exemption equivalent" had been $600,000, only about .3% of all decedents would have had estates subject to federal estate tax. Even with inflation, therefore, the estates of the vast majority of Americans will be free of estate and gift tax liability under the new law.

From a tax planning standpoint, this very substantial increase in the unified credit and elimination of the estate tax on the estates of most Americans will have two very important implications. The first deals with the current extensive use of the two trust (marital and non-marital) approach to estate planning for moderate sized estates. The second arises from the recently restored step-up in basis at death for the property included in the estate of a decedent.

While there are numerous non-tax reasons for the use of trusts, most estate planners whose practice consists in substantial measure of moderate size estates (in the $200,000 to $500,000 range) are aware that the factor that has been most often decisive when clients with such estates elect to use trusts for spouses is the potential tax saving at the death of the surviving spouse for the benefit of the children which use of various trusts permits. Under the law, prior to ERTA if the combined estates of the spouses amount to $600,000 and remain at that level until the death of the survivor, a decision of the spouses to use a simple will by which the first to die leaves everything to the survivor would have cost the children as much as $105,000 in avoidable federal estate tax liability. Even if the combined estates total only $350,000, a similar approach would have cost the children nearly $58,000 in avoidable federal estate tax liability. While the administrative and similar costs of handling a trust must be offset against the saving and while some practitioners content that savings of even this magnitude do not justify the use of an otherwise unwanted trust, most clients when confronted directly with these choices in the past opted for the most tax-efficient structure.

The estate tax marital deduction has long been the central core of basic estate planning

Under ERTA, so long as the survivor of the two spouses lives until 1987, there will be no federal estate tax on either estate even if the first to die leaves his or her entire estate outright to the survivor, so long as the survivor's estate does not exceed $600,000. Accordingly, one very significant estate planning implication of ERTA is likely to be a shift from trusts for spouses to outright bequests to spouses in the wills of a very large number of persons. While a failure to consider such a change in the estate plan of clients will not have any death tax cost, the estate will still incur the normal administrative costs associated with the utilization of a trust structure.

Although estate tax saving may have been the decisive motivation in a particular instance for the creation of marital and non-marital trusts in an individual's will or trust agreement, the reduced significance of such tax saving may bring other factors previously viewed as supplemental or incidental advantages of the trust structure in such a situation to the fore. Such considerations as protecting the assets of the deceased spouse for the benefit of the children in the event of the remarriage of the surviving spouse, professional management of the trust assets, protection from creditors through spendthrift clauses, state death tax savings, and income tax savings in the case of a discretionary trusts will have to be reviewed more closely before an appropriate decision can be made.

Where protection of children is considered important, the taxpayer can still arrange trust protection without the use of a non marital trust by arranging for his spouse to include trust provisions in her will.

The second important consequence of the increase in the unified credit arises from the availability of the step-up in basis for assets included in the estate of a decedent. If, in accordance with Administration claims, well over 99% of the estates of Americans will be free of estate tax in 1987 when the new system is fully phased in, it follows that well over 99% of Americans will have the opportunity to eliminate potential capital gains in their appreciated assets without any corresponding federal estate tax cost. Although the reduction by ERTA of the maximum capital gains tax rate to 20% may lessen the importance of the step-up to a limited extent, the substantial buildup of unrealized gains often present in estates and the lack in many instances of a significant offsetting detriment should make this consideration very important in future planning.

This situation could very well reverse the whole approach of prior planning in many circumstances. Prior to 1977, for example, the utilization of a regular gift program to take advantage of the annual exclusion, the separate gift tax exemption and the separate gift tax rate schedule was a well established estate planning technique for large numbers of clients. Even under the current unified transfer tax system such gifts were often recommended in the case of appreciating assets to eliminate the increase in value from the estate. In contrast, under ERTA such a program may not only produce no saving in estate tax costs, but may also cause the loss of the otherwise available valuable step-up in basis. Indeed, the prospect of estate planning through gifts to elderly relatives rather than from elderly relatives may deserve legitimate consideration in appropriate circumstances.

Mindful of the possible transfer of appreciated assets to elderly individuals in order to obtain the step-up in basis, Congress included in the new Act a provision which denies the step-up in basis to property "acquired by the decedent by gift" during the one year period ending on the date of the decedent's death if such property is acquired from the decedent by (or passes from the decedent to) the donor of such property (or the spouse of the donor) by reason of the decedent's death. It applies to property acquired after the date of the enactment of ERTA by decedents dying after 1981.

"For a copy of the informative brochure YOU AND THE 1981 TAX ACT, either telephone or send your name and address to Dr. Fred J. Foley, Jr., Director of Development, La Salle College, Philadelphia, PA 19141, (215) 951-1540."

B. REDUCTION IN MAXIMUM RATES OF TAX

ERTA provides for a reduction in the maximum marginal rate of tax from the current seventy percent to fifty percent over a four year period. The reduction will be phased in as follows:

YEAR	TOP RATE
1982	65% of excess over $4,000,000
1983	60% of excess over $3,500,000
1984	55% of excess over $3,000,000
1985 and thereafter	50% of excess over $2,500,000

No corresponding change has been made in the rates determining the maximum credit for state death taxes. Value of these credits will continue to increase for larger estates. Accordingly, in situations where state inheritance taxes exceed the available credit, the marginal net federal estate tax will actually decrease as the estate increases in size.

The reduction in the maximum rate of tax, taken alone, should not substantially affect estate planning approaches. When combined with the new unlimited estate tax marital deduction, however, the rate reduction may strongly encourage deferral of tax, as discussed more fully hereafter in connection with the marital deduction.

The four year phase-in of the new maximum rate will also create certain incentives for deferral of tax. The payment of tax on the estate of a decedent dying in 1982 through 1984, as opposed to postponement of it until the death of his or her spouse, will mean that the tax on the first estate will be paid without the full benefit of the new reduced maximum rates. If the surviving spouse lives beyond 1984, complete deferral of tax through the marital deduction may cost little or nothing and in some instances will even produce a saving because of the lower maximum rate in effect thereafter.

QUANTITATIVE MARITAL DEDUCTION CHANGE— THE UNLIMITED MARITAL DEDUCTION

The law prior to ERTA limited the estate tax marital deduction to the greater of $250,000 or one-half of the adjusted gross estate. The gift tax marital deduction was allowed for the first $100,000 of eligible gifts to a spouse and for one-half of such gifts in excess of $200,000.

ERTA eliminates entirely the dollar and percentage limits for both the estate tax and gift tax marital deductions for decedents dying and gifts made after 1981, thereby making qualifying transfers to a spouse both during lifetime and at death eligible for the marital deduction to an unlimited extent. With the exception of certain special transfers of "qualified terminable interest property," transfers between husbands and wives must continue to comply with all current requirements for the marital deduction to be eligible for the unlimited marital deduction.

From an estate planning standpoint, the implications of the introduction of both the unlimited gift tax marital deduction and the unlimited estate tax marital deduction are drastic.

The availability of an unlimited gift tax marital deduction should, in effect, double the flexibility from a tax planning standpoint of lifetime planning and their use in conjunction with appropriate testamentary transfers. Under the law prior to 1977, when one spouse owned the bulk of the assets (or in the case of jointly owned property, supplied the bulk of the funds for their purchase), there was little which could be done without significant gift tax cost, if the spouse with fewer assets died first, to achieve the tax saving promised by the standard marital and non-marital trust plan. While the unlimited marital deduction for the first $100,000 of interspousal lifetime transfers added by the Tax Reform Act of 1976 provided a very limited relief of this problem, the estate planner was still basically in the position of having to advise his clients: "The documents I have prepared will help you to achieve the promised tax savings only if you can arrange to die in the proper order."

With the availability of an unlimited gift tax marital deduction, this situation is completely changed. From a tax standpoint, the estate planner will usually be in a position to design a plan which will achieve the same saving regardless of the order of deaths of the spouses. For example, if one spouse has assets of $1,200,000 and the other spouse has only nominal assets, the spouses will be in a position to divide the assets so that each has an estate of $600,000 without the imposition of any gift tax. If each spouse has a will creating a trust for the benefit of the other similar to the current form of non-marital trust, and the assets do not appreciate in value, the spouses will ultimately be able to pass their assets on to their children without the imposition of any federal estate tax. In contrast, under prior law the bulk of the tax could not readily be avoided if the spouse owning most of the assets were the survivor.

Because such rearrangements of the assets will generally involve irrevocable transfers during lifetime, they usually create a host of potential non-tax pitfalls. With the newly-created incentive to transfer assets, such problems are likely to be greatly magnified. The effect of such transfers in the event of divorce and their impact upon the ultimate disposition of the assets after the death of the survivor will have to be carefully considered. The possible remarriage of the surviving spouse will take on much greater significance. For example in Pennsylvania in the absence of an arrangement the surviving spouse in a second marriage could elect to take one-third ($\frac{1}{3}$) of the estate even though he or she is given no interest in the estate by the will of his or her second spouse. This could result in great disappointment to the children of the first marriage. In every second marriage situation consideration of a pre-nuptial agreement should be imperative so that each spouse can control his or her own assets free of elective rights under state law.

The estate tax marital deduction has long been the central core of basic estate planning. Successful utilization of the marital deduction in estate planning has basically been aimed at achieving two important goals—avoiding the imposition of federal estate tax on the same assets in the estate of both spouses (double taxation) and splitting of a larger estate into two smaller ones to take advantage of the progressive character of the rate structure (equalization).

The double taxation problem will be entirely eliminated. Virtually, any asset which passes from the first spouse to the second in a form which causes it to be included in the latter's estate will be deducted in computing the taxable estate of the first. Asset structures of estates consisting exclusively of jointly held assets and life insurance payable to the spouse will no longer produce the over qualification problem. In short, the objective of avoiding double taxation of the same assets in the estates of spouses will no longer play any role in estate planning.

The desirability of equalization will be offset by the opportunity available to defer the tax entirely until the death of the second spouse. From a tax planning standpoint alone, the decision as to whether to utilize the unlimited marital deduction will amount primarily to the balancing of these two factors—the benefit during the life of the survivor of the use of the funds that would otherwise have been used to pay taxes in the estate of the first against the possible reduction in total taxes payable on the estates of the two spouses.

At the outset, it would seem the scales would be tipped significantly in favor of deferral. The small difference between the top 50% marginal rate and the bottom 37% rate when the new maximum rate and increased unified credit are fully phased in will certainly provide a strong impetus for deferral, particularly in large estates. By electing to defer the taxes, the survivor will have more funds to invest and will usually more than make up the potential future taxes in invested income.

Even from a tax standpoint there will, nevertheless, be some who will not wish to use the unlimited marital deduction to achieve a complete deferral of tax, particularly where the spouse may have substantial assets of his or her own. Many more will not want to use it because it will result in a loss of part or all of the benefit of the increased unified credit available to the first estate. Likewise, from the standpoint of non-tax considerations, an increase in the size of the marital share will create virtually all of the problems previously discussed in connection with equalization of assets during lifetime.

The use of the new qualified terminable interest trust, which will be discussed in later articles, may help to resolve some of these problems.

In enacting ERTA, Congress realized that the new unlimited marital deduction provisions could cause unanticipated problems for the existing wills. Therefore, Congress included a transitional rule in the law. This provides that wills created prior to Sept. 12, 1981, will not be entitled to the new marital deduction unless the will is amended after that date and the state of residence amends its law to permit the unlimited marital deduction.

The transition rule is designed to prevent the distortion in estate plans which will result from an unanticipated increased marital share. For wills written in 1977 and thereafter, however, a much more serious distortion in estate plans may well result from the unanticipated decreased marital share resulting from the substantial increase in the unified credit. Most of those wills call for a marital deduction share no greater than an amount sufficient to eliminate the tax. As the unified credit increases, such a marital share will decrease. If the entire estate turns out to be smaller than the applicable exemption equivalent, the marital share will be eliminated altogether.

The severity of the consequences of this situation will depend upon the terms of the non-marital share. The most fortunate surviving spouse will find that he has the right to the entire income from the estate assets, the availability of estate principal for his benefit in the discretion of someone else, and the right to appoint the assets by will to anyone other than himself, his estate, his creditors, or the creditors of his estate. The least fortunate spouse may find that he has no interest whatsoever in any portion of the estate because the non-marital trust has been designed for the exclusive benefit of the children or someone else. In virtually all estates of under $1,200,000 with such a formula marital deduction clause, a significant distortion of the anticipated estate plan will occur by 1987, and a massive effort to review and revise documents will be required if such distortions are to be avoided. This should be reason enough to review your wills now if you have not already done so. ■

(Additional aspects of the 1981 Act will be discussed in future articles. Some of the topics to be considered will include Qualified Terminable Interest Trusts, Joint Property, and Gift Tax Exclusions.)

OPEN HOUSE

Thousands of parents, friends and prospective students spend a festive day enjoying various displays, shows, and exhibits during the annual Open House held throughout the campus. This year's festival, sponsored by the college's Students' Government Association is scheduled for Sunday, November 7.

Around Campus

The Women's Studies Steering Committee (from left): Drs. Barbara Levy Simon, Caryn M. Musil, and Arlene B. Dallery.

Concentrating on Women's Studies

It started out as an experimental, team-taught Special Topics offering in 1973—"Image of Women in British and American Culture." Soon the History Department added a course, followed by the English Department, then Sociology.

By 1978, every Women's Studies course being offered on campus was filled to capacity. Today, the Women's Studies Concentration, having featured 16 different course offerings over the past decade, is a popular part of the academic curriculum with both women and men in the college's Day and Evening Divisions.

Women's Studies is not a major field of study, but a complement to other academic majors. In order to fulfill the requirements for the concentration, students must take a minimum of six courses that embrace at least three different disciplines.

Women's Studies courses are now regularly offered by the English, History, Philosophy, Psychology, Religion, and Sociology Departments. Academic disciplines in other areas like Political Science, Biology, and Business are being encouraged to develop similar courses by the Women's Studies Steering Committee comprised of Drs. Arlene B. Dallery, associate professor of Philosophy; Caryn M. Musil, associate professor of English and Communication Arts, and Barbara Levy Simon, assistant professor of Social Work and Sociology.

"Women's Studies has made a difference in the ability of students to relate to members of the opposite sex—to talk about their fears, anxieties, and inhibitions," said Dr. Musil, who expects between 250 and 300 men and women to take women's courses each semester.

"The courses aren't designed to be easy," explained Dr. Dallery, who taught two sections of "Concepts of Liberation: Women and Men" last year. "They are designed as rigorous intellectual efforts. And they provide an emotionally supportive atmosphere for women." Dr. Dallery's course also attracted the highest percentage of men last fall (35%) of any Women's Studies offering so far.

La Salle has been completely coeducational since 1971 with women now comprising about 44% of its day school enrollment of 3,600. When the college's Academic Affairs Committee approved the Women's Studies Concentration in April, 1981, La Salle joined some 332 other institutions of higher learning offering some type of women's program. Approval for the program also climaxed a decade-long crusade by Dr. Musil and her colleagues to keep women's studies in the mainstream of the college curriculum.

"In 1971, I found a great desire on the part of most faculty and administrators—a genuine effort to integrate women into La Salle's campus," Dr. Musil recalls. "We made all the necessary physical changes, but didn't realize how the curriculum reaffirmed that men were the important shapers and writers. How it emphasized the lack of significance of women in history, literature, the sciences. We all had categories."

"My starting point of view is that men have a profound lack of experience with a feminist," says Dr. Simon whose "Sex, Power and Socialization" course attracted 30% male attendance last spring. "Many men perceive feminists as man-hating, kidnapping, selfish battle-axes. Their portrayal of feminists are not in the ballpark. The men I get are brave enough to check out the stereotype. Men who are brave and willing to take a look within themselves. We discuss many delicate topics."

Dr. Dallery says that her Women's Studies course in philosophy last fall was the "most interesting, enjoyable course" she's ever taught. She didn't concentrate on women philosophers, but emphasized women's issues like work, family life, love, sexuality, marriage, and responsibility. She investigated and analyzed social institutions and was more concerned with contemporary programs and relationships between women and men.

"It was very interesting to discuss the male experience with the men in the class," recalls Dr. Dallery. "It was a totally new experience for me to discuss love and sexuality with both men and women. It was really illuminating. Studies have shown that men don't discuss emotions as openly as women. The men liked the course a whole lot. They said it was a valuable experience for them, especially the men who don't understand the women's experience from an intellectual or experimental point of view."

Dr. Dallery recalls that as a graduate student at Yale University it was clear that there was no great women philosophers to study. "I thought it would be great to investigate the great philosophers, to analyze the views of women philosophers," she says. "But women philosophy teachers just didn't exist. I found that Plato and Aristotle when they were talking about the good life they were talking about men, about courage and virtue, military conquest and valor. We were excluded from discussions of human nature and virtue conceptually.

"Philosophy doesn't do justice to women's moral experience and rights. It's not pertinent enough to women's moral experience. Eventually, I would like to do something more philosophical, but now I'm more concerned with current social relationships between men and women."

The long term goals of Women's Studies Concentration are to have such courses become a permanent part of the college's curriculum in every department, where women's experiences, outlooks, and values can be discussed from the point of view of each discipline.

"Women's Studies has one foot in the door as an academic pursuit," says Dr. Simon. "But it has to get the other foot in the door in practical theory."

President's Associates Adds 16 New Members

Sixteen prominent business, communications, legal and medical leaders have been named to La Salle's President's Associates, it was announced by Brother President Patric Ellis, F.S.C., PhD.

Named to three year terms on the advisory board were: Albert J. Crawford, Jr., Esq., '36, partner, Crawford and George, Media; R.F. (Ray) Desiderio, administrative vice president, Continental Bank and Trust Company, Philadelphia; Brother Richard Emenecker, F.S.C., '61, superintendent, Bureau of Cable Communications, city of Pittsburgh; Joseph H. Foster, Esq., '50, partner, White and Williams, Philadelphia, and Brian J. Gail, '69, senior vice president, Ted Bates Agency, New York.

Also: Joseph J. Gerngross, president, Gerngross Corporation, Philadelphia; Raymond S. Green, president, WFLN Radio, Philadelphia; Arthur H. Hayes, Jr., M.D., commissioner of food and drugs and assistant U.S. surgeon general, Rockville, MD;

Anne Walsh (left), coordinator of the new Health Care Administration Program, discusses course offerings with Carolyn Perrong and Joel Davne.

Gregory T. Magarity, Esq., Wolf, Block, Schorr, Solis-Cohen, Philadelphia; Fred C. Mischler, '60, sales representative, J.R. Richards Co., Glenside, and Gerald P. Nugent, Jr., '49, president, Tischler Express, Inc., Philadelphia.

Also: Fred F. Rizzo, Jr., '59, senior vice president, Fidelity Bank, Philadelphia; Patricia Shelton, director of public affairs, WFIL Radio, Philadelphia; Francis H. Sterling, M.D., '56, Havertown; Vito A. Vallecce, M.D., Haddonfield, NJ, and Helen M. Walters, vice president, fundamental research division, Smith, Barney, Harris, Upsham & Co., New York.

La Salle's 34 member Council of President's Associates is a vital adjunct to the college's Board of Trustees, its president, and total development effort. Among other functions, it participates in long-range planning for educational programs and the development of human as well as financial resources.

Program in Health Care Administration Begins

La Salle recently introduced a unique undergraduate Health Care Administration program.

The program is designed to augment the student's undergraduate major with specialized elective courses in health care administration. Two options are available.

The financial management option consists of a core of five elective courses with an emphasis upon health care accounting/finance while the generalist option consists of a core of four elective courses with an emphasis in health care planning and policy analysis.

Both options will include a field experience in an area health care institution which will provide an opportunity to apply theory as well as gain valuable professional experience.

Anne Walsh, coordinator of the Health Care Administration program noted that the demand for qualified health care administration has substantially increased during the past decade. Data from the Bureau of Employment Security projects a need for 8,546 health care administrators by 1985—an increase of 27.4% across the state.

Typically, health care administration is associated with hospitals. However, numerous employment opportunities exist in other sectors of the health care field.

Public health centers, health maintenance organizations, mental health/mental retardation facilities, regulatory agencies, and private enterprises such as medical supply/equipment and pharmaceutical companies, also need competent individuals who understand the organization and operation of the health care system.

La Salle is the only local undergraduate member college in the Association of University Programs in Health Administration.

College Sponsors Small Business Development

La Salle has established a Small Business Development Center designed to provide free comprehensive management assistance and services to the small business community in the Greater Philadelphia area.

Directed by Dr. Bernard B. Goldner, professor of management at the college and a prominent consultant to industry and government, La Salle's SBDC is part of a state-wide network of small business development centers funded by the Federal Government, private firms and foundations, and sponsoring educational institutions.

Goldner, who is also owner-manager of several small businesses, said that assistance will be provided in such areas as accounting and record-keeping, financial analysis and planning, preparation of financial statements, loan applications, business plans for new ventures, long-range planning, advertising, marketing, and information systems using micro-computers.

In addition, assistance will be available for small businesses to identify management problems, develop corrective measures, and create alternative solutions.

La Salle's Small Business Development Center will be staffed by selected faculty members, graduate and undergraduate students, community accountants, and members of the Service Corps of Retired Executives (SCORE), and Active Corps of Executives (ACE).

Goldner explained that La Salle College has been operating a Small Business Institute for eight years and that his staff members are well-aware of not only the problems faced by small businesses but of the importance of such organizations.

Describing small businesses as the "backbone of our free enterprise system," Goldner added that such firms represent approximately 98% of the nation's businesses which are responsible for 43% of our Gross National Product. They also employ 58% of the nation's private, non-farm work force, he said.

The SBDCs in Pennsylvania are part of a national network of similar programs which receive 50% of their funding from the Small Business Administration.

For information about La Salle's Small Business Development Center, call or write Dr. Goldner at College Hall 301 C, La Salle College, 20th St. and Olney Ave., Philadelphia, PA 19141 (951-1416).

Look For Explorers To Run More This Year

By Bill Hunt

Last season, La Salle head basketball coach Dave "Lefty" Ervin went through an ordeal that makes coaches age quickly. With a starting line-up of four freshmen and a junior, Ervin had to reach back for added patience as his team made typical freshman errors.

It is said, however, that the best thing about freshmen is that they become sophomores, and in 1982-83 the Explorers have what could be termed a veteran nucleus that should let Coach Ervin sleep easier at night.

"With the entire starting unit returning intact, I would hope we'd be much more stable from the first game on," says the fourth year La Salle coach. "I feel we had a very good second half of the season, and to a person there was improvement. I hope we can continue to improve."

The Explorers did indeed have a strong second half of the season, finishing with a 16-13 record and reaching the semi-finals

The Tragedy at Phi Kappa Theta

Members of the college's community were stunned, shocked, and saddened by a tragic fire in the early morning hours of September 9 that destroyed the Phi Kappa Theta Fraternity House across the street from the campus, took the life of one student, and injured eight other young men.

Dennis Dougherty, a 19-year-old sophomore from suburban North Hills who was majoring in finance and computer science, was trapped as flames raced through the three story, 100 year-old English Tudor structure located at 545 E. Wister St.

Dougherty, who had recently been elected a vice president of the fraternity, was buried in Holy Sepulchre Cemetery following a Mass of Resurrection at Queen of Peace Church in Ardsley. Hundreds of mourners attended the impressive, emotional ceremonies and heard eulogies expressed by fraternity brothers, friends and Christian Brothers from La Salle High School and College.

The devastated feeling of the college community was, perhaps, best expressed by Brother President Patrick Ellis, F.S.C., Ph.D. who said, "I speak for all at La Salle when I say that Dennis Dougherty's death is a tragedy beyond our power to grieve. All of us extend deepest sympathy to the family, and promise prayers for Dennis's eternal happiness and for his family's consolation. Nothing can assuage the terrible loss and shock. In time, we hope to be of some little help by making clear the esteem and love that Dennis had earned from all who knew him."

Brother Joseph F. Burke, F.S.C., Ph.D., Chairman of the psychology department and the college's advisor to the fraternity, recalled Dougherty as someone who had made no enemies in the fraternity. "Dennis was highly-respected by his Fraternity Brothers," Burke said. "He was a very gentle, very idealistic person who would take the time to listen very carefully to both sides in a discussion. He always believed in the best of everyone else."

Phi Kappa Theta is an international fraternity comprised of some 53 chapters. It came into existence in its present form in 1959 when Phi Kappa (which was founded at Brown University in 1889) merged with Theta Kappa Phi (founded at Lehigh University in 1919). Both fraternities had originally exclusively served Catholic students who were unable to join other fraternities. Its 41 members at La Salle have been active in a number of community projects such as volunteering at the college's annual Open House and organizing fundraising projects for the Building Blocks Child Care Center and The Eagles' "Fly for Leukemia" Drive.

of the East Coast Conference Championships.

Of the returning players in the Explorer starting five, sophomore guard Steve Black is the main cog. The leading freshman scorer in NCAA Division I a year ago, Black thrilled crowds from California to Connecticut with his acrobatic drives and his pinpoint jump shooting. Ervin would like, however, to take some of the pressure off his 20 point per game scorer this year.

To help do that, the coach recruited a pair of Pennsylvania All-State guards in Chip Greenberg and Gary Jones. "With the addition of Greenberg and Jones, we have a luxury at guard," says Ervin. "Steve will be able to pace himself a little more and we'll be able to rest him a lot more."

With the depth at the guard slot, Ervin plans to press and fast-break a great deal more. "We are changing our theme and approach to the game," reveals Ervin. "We are going to fast-break a lot more by design this year and also play 90-foot defense."

The main people in the Explorer running game will be greyhounds such as Black, returning forward Ralph Lewis, returning guards Dallas Philson and Pete Tiano, as well as Greenberg and Jones.

Lewis had an excellent season last winter after making the Explorer roster as a walk-on. An excellent leaper, the 6'5" Lewis finished as the team's third leading scorer and rebounder. "Lewis should continue his growth pattern," says Ervin.

Philson and Tiano shared the point guard duties a year ago as freshman, and the experience they gained will be invaluable this season. Greenberg should also fit right into the Explorer game plan. The MVP of the prestigious Dapper Dan Roundball Classic in Pittsburgh, Greenberg was the most highly recruited schoolboy in Pennsylvania last season. Jones, a state champion sprinter in high school last spring, should also feel at home in La Salle's "stepped-up" offense.

Dave Davis, a 6'4" guard with a fine outside shot, and 6'3" Ralph Gilmore will also see action. Davis contributed in many games last season as the big guard, while Gilmore made the most of his opportunities as a point guard.

When La Salle slows the ball down, the imposing sight of 7'1" Tom Piotrowski will be present. Piotrowski had his best season last year, averaging 11.1 points and 7.0 rebounds a game. Coach Ervin would like to see more explosions, like his 27 points game against Canisius, from his big center. "I think you will see Tom emerge as a solid low post scorer this year," says Ervin.

To get the rebounds and start the Explorers fast-break will be 6'9" Albert Butts, the second leading rebounder in the ECC a year ago. A very physical player, Butts should team with Piotrowski to help La Salle control the boards.

Beyond Piotrowski and Butts, the Explorers "do not have a lot of size," admits Ervin. The coach is confident, however, that this duo can handle the board duties, and that his forward reserves will also help. Top reserves are 6'6" Dave Kerins, a rugged forward who was slowed last year by a knee injury, and 6'5" leaper Phil Burton. "We're going to need rebound help so one of those three must come through," notes Ervin.

Another demanding schedule faces the Explorers in 1982-83. It includes a road date with Notre Dame and tough tournaments at Marquette and Marshall. La Salle will face Cincinnati in the first round of the Milwaukee Classic while Texas A&M awaits in the Marshall Tournament. The team must also face Western Kentucky on the road while hosting Duke University in the Palestra. As usual, the Philadelphia Big Five will be strong and competitive.

Coach Ervin seems ready for the challenges ahead. "This season will be a lot more fun for me, the players and also the fan."

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION NEWS

Dates Announced For Homecoming Weekend & Golf Outing

Alumni Homecoming week-end will be May 20-22, 1983, it was announced by John J. Fallon, '67, president of the Alumni Association.

Subsequent to an announcement in the Summer issue of this publication, reunion committees have held their first meetings with representatives of the Alumni Office and will be communicating plans to their classmates in the coming months.

The first full-scale reunion program since the Dix plan was discarded two years ago, reunions are being planned for the Classes of '33, '38, '43, '48, '53, '58, '63, '68, '73 and '78.

Next Spring, for the first time, the Explorer Golf Outing will be sponsored by the general Alumni Association and will be a part of Homecoming Weekend activities. The fifth such outing will be held on Friday, May 20, at Lu Lu Country Club, Limekiln Pike and Jenkintown Road, in North Hills, Pa.

Memorial Dedicated in Honor of Deceased Faculty & Staff Members

"The best way to honor these people is to reflect on their contributions and to test ourselves by them," said Brother President Patrick Ellis on September 7 at ceremonies dedicating an Olney Hall plaque in the memory of 54 deceased members of the college's administration, faculty, and staff. Brother President Emeritus Gregory Paul (second from left) chaired a special committee that designed the plaque and established the criteria for the inclusion of names of deceased members of the La Salle College community. Members of the committee included Brother Christopher (second from right), Dr. Joseph Flubacher (left), Dr. John Penny, and Patrick Sheekey (right), with Dr. Roland Holroyd serving as a resource person.
